

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

Stanford University Libraries

3 6105 117 388 699

Early Britain

Celtic

Britain

J. Rhys

—

1

.

.

EARLY BRITAIN.

CELTIC BRITAIN.

BY

J. RHYS, M.A.,

PROFESSOR OF CELTIC IN THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD; FELLOW OF JESUS COLLEGE; AND LATE FELLOW OF MERTON COLLEGE.

WITH TWO MAPS, AND WOODCUTS OF COINS.

SECOND EDITION, REVISED.

PUBLISHED UNDER THE DIRECTION OF THE TRACT COMMITTEE.

LONDON:
SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE,
NORTHUMBERLAND AVENUE, CHARING CROSS, W.C. ;
43, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C. ;
26, ST. GEORGE'S PLACE, HYDE PARK CORNER, S.W.
BRIGHTON: 135, NORTH STREET.
NEW YORK: E. & J. B. YOUNG & CO.

1884.

LIBRARY OF THE LELAND STANFORD JR. UNIVERSITY.

α. 44730

OCT 20 1900

WYMAN AND SONS, PRINTERS, GREAT QUEEN STREET, LINCOLN'S-INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

P R E F A C E.

THESE are the days of little books, and when the author was asked to add one to their number, he accepted the invitation with the jaunty simplicity of an inexperienced hand, thinking that it could not give him much trouble to expand or otherwise modify the account given of early Britain in larger works; but closer acquaintance with them soon convinced him of the folly of such a plan—he had to study the subject for himself or leave it alone. In trying to do the former he probably read enough to have enabled him to write a larger work than this; but he would be ashamed to confess how long it has occupied him.

As a student of language, he is well aware that no severer judgment could be passed on his essay in writing history than that it should be found to be as bad as the etymologies made by historians are wont to be; but so essential is the study of Celtic names to the elucidation of the early history of Britain that the risk is thought worth incurring. The difficulty of writing anything intelligible on the subject arises not only from the scarcity of the data handed down by ancient authors, but also in a great measure from the absence of the information necessary to enable one rightly to connect those data with one another. Take, for instance, the allusion by Ammianus Marcellinus to the Verturiones as one of the nations of the north of Britain: one cannot be said to be much the wiser for it, until one happens to recognize the regular Goidelic form of their name re-emerging as that of the Men of Fortrenn, who play an important part in the history of Alban. Identifications of this kind will, it is hoped, do something to bring the history of early Britain out of the quicksands into which historians' etymologizing has helped to steer it, and to make up for the shortcomings of the work. These will probably be found to be of two kinds: the errors into which one unaccustomed to write on historical subjects can hardly avoid falling; and the crudities of certain theories which further research may show to be untenable. For it is unavoidable that much of the reasoning should be of a highly hypothetical nature, of which the reader will in due time be reminded by the changes rung on such hard-driven words as appears and seems, as probably, possibly, and perhaps.

Two or three words may here be appended as to some of the authorities cited, with which the general reader may not be very familiar. For the writings of Gildas the references are to those published by Haddan and Stubbs, in the first volume of their work, entitled "Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland": those learned authors regarded Gildas as having written no later than 547 or 550. Great liberty has been taken with Nennius in these pages as a number of tracts of various dates and origins are more or less loosely associated with him; but the author is happy to be now able to refer to an account of the whole group in a recently published work by M. Arthur de la Borderie (Paris and London, 1883), a small volume which may be recommended as a model of clearness and precision calculated to dispel much of the haze floating round the name of Nennius. What has been here sometimes called the Welsh Chronicle is also known by the fancy name of Annales Cambriæ, under which it was published in 1860 for the Master of the Rolls, from three manuscripts: the oldest of them appears to end with the year 954, while one of the other two brings the entries down to 1288. They are written in Latin, and the author takes the liberty of stating that he has heard no less an authority than Mr. Freeman speak of them in comparatively strong terms of praise. To avoid unnecessary misunderstanding from another source it is right to add that one and the same Irish manuscript has carelessly been cited in this volume, sometimes by its native name of Lebar na h-Uidre, and sometimes by the translated one of the Book of the Dun. It was published in lithographed facsimile by the Royal Irish Academy (Dublin, 1870); and it derives its name from the story, that the original, of which the existing manuscript is a fragmentary copy, was written by St. Ciaran on the skin of a favourite dun cow, which, when he escaped from his father's house to enter a monastery, spontaneously followed him, and faithfully served him for many years. The copy dates about the end of the eleventh century, since it is on sad record that the transcriber was murdered by a party of robbers in the stone church of Clonmacnois in the year 1106. Lastly, mention must here be made of a work of capital importance, which came into the market just as these sheets had passed through the press, to wit, Vigfusson and Powell's Corpus Poeticum Boreale (Oxford, 1883): the Norse text and the rendering of the same into English, together with the mine of rare learning in the numerous notes and excursuses appended, will be found to be interesting first and foremost, it is true, to the student of literature and of civilization generally; but they are scarcely less so to writers on history, not only when they undertake to describe the doings of the Wickings in Alban and the islands adjacent, but also when they would grapple with the much harder task of trying to give a full and satisfactory answer to the difficult question, what manner of men the Norsemen found there.

Moreover, he has accepted and employed the theory advanced by ethnologists, that the early inhabitants of this country were of Iberian origin; and he hopes to take an early opportunity of writing on the glottological aspect of that question; also of explaining more in detail why he has changed his opinion as to the classification of the Celtic nations. Then to come to a matter of spelling, it has been attempted throughout to present the early Celtic names in their native form rather than in a Latinized one; but with regard to the later names he would be greatly surprised to find that he had succeeded in being consistent, as it is by no means easy to choose from the variety of spellings used at different times, or even in different manuscripts of the same age.

Lastly, the author has great pleasure in thanking many kind and learned friends for valuable suggestions and corrections. He would mention them by name but that he is loth to risk the danger of their being in a manner held sponsors for opinions not theirs.

J. RHYS.

OXFORD, Jan., 1884.

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I.

BRITAIN IN THE TIME OF JULIUS CÆSAR.

Preliminary Remarks... ..	Page	1
Names of the Celts and their classification... ..		2
Pytheas and his visits to Britain		5
Posidonius visiting it		7
Cæsar's first expedition to Britain		8
His second expedition		13
Britain after Cæsar's departure. Early coins : copper : iron		18
Inscribed coins and the tribes of southern Britain. Commios and his Sons		21
Coins of Tasciovant, Cunobelinos, and others. Policy of the Catuvelauni		26
The Eцени : the situation of some of the tribes : Commios and the Catuvelauni		28

CHAPTER II.

BRITAIN BEFORE THE CLAUDIAN CONQUEST.

Allusions to Britain in the works of ancient authors ...	32
Coins of the Dobunni and other Western Tribes ...	35
The policy of the Eцени	36
The Cornavii, the Coritani, the Brigantes, the Parisi and their coins	38

CONTENTS.

ix

The tribes that used coins, and those that did not. Trade routes : the exportation of tin Page	41
No direct trade between Cornwall and the Continent. The Carthaginians never here. The Veneti and their marine	47
The population of Britain, the growing of corn, tattooing, polyandry	52
Political state of the Brythons mostly like that of the Gauls	57
Kings of the old type disappearing among the Brythons ...	61
Kings by divine right among the Goidels compared with those of Greece in the Heroic Age	63
Aryan polytheism of the Celts in Britain. Druidism derived from the Aborigines	67
The Druidic tonsure	74

CHAPTER III.

THE ROMANS IN BRITAIN, AND HOW THEY LEFT IT.
The conquest of the island by Aulus Plautius	76
Ostorius operating against the Eцени, Decangi, and Brigantes	80
Ostorius's engagements with the Silures, and the defeat of Caratacos	81
Seutonius Paulinus reaching Mona, and Tacitus's account of the Druids	83
The revolt of the Eцени	84
Britain under Vespasian's great generals, Petilius Cerealis, Julius Frontinus, and Julius Agricola	85
Britain down to the death of Severus in 211	90
Britain independent under Carausius and Allectus. Re-joined to the empire by Constantius Chlorus in 296, cleared of invaders by Theodosius in 369	93

Maximus taking the troops from Britain in 387. Constantine doing the same in 407. The Roman officials driven out in 410 Page	95
Britain, Upper and Lower. Administration of the province by the Romans	97
Christianity and Latin in Britain : military character of the province	101
The province, after the Romans left, governed by native successors of the Dux Britanniarum and Comes Litoris Saxonici	102
Lower Britain under Aurelius Ambrosius	104
The rise of English States in Lower Britain	105
Summary of the dealings of the West Saxons with the Celtic inhabitants down to the time of Æthelstán	107
What became of the Celts of Lower Britain	109

CHAPTER IV.

THE KYMRY.

The peoples of Upper Britain, the rise of English states in the same	112
The jurisdiction of the Dux Britanniarum marking the limits of the State of the Kymry	116
The Latin Dux becoming the Welsh Gwledig : Cunedda the first Gwledig	118
The rule of Cunedda and his Sons	120
The princes of Upper Britain in the time of Gildas	122
The legend how Maelgwn acquired his power	124
Maelgwn's successors, and the battle of Chester	125
Wars of the Kymry with Eadwine and his successors	128
The Gwledig, sometimes called dragon , and the English term Bretwalda related	134

CONTENTS.

xi

The contest with the Angles as pictured in Welsh literature. The name Kymro	Page 138
The land of the Kymry severed into Wales and Cumbria :
English encroachments on the former	140
Summary of the history of Wales down to 1090	141
Cambria and Cumbria , forms of one name	143
Summary of the history of Cumbria	143

CHAPTER V.

THE PICTS AND THE SCOTS.

The Picts of Galloway	149
The Picts of Lothian	150
Remarks on Manaw and Galloway	153
The Dalriad Scots in Britain	155
The Picts beyond the Forth	159
The Pictish kingdom not Celtic in its origin. The relative position of the chief peoples of the North	161
The growth of the power of the Mæatae and other Picts	165
The Picts from the time of Brude mac Maelchon to the ecclesiastical revolution under Nechtan	170
Nechtán and his competitors for power: the Brython Ungust overcoming the rest	174
The Brythons of Fortrenn mostly in power till their defeat by the Danes in 839	178
Kenneth mac Alpin establishing the power of the Goidels	181
Kenneth's successors down to the year 900: the kingdom beginning to be called Alban	183
Summary of the history of Alban till the death of Kenneth's last male descendant in 1034	185

Duncan and Macbeth	Page 189
Macbeth not so much a usurper as leader of the Picts in their effort to reassert their power	191
The spread of the Goidelic Language in Alban under the Kenneth dynasty	196
The rise of Feudalism in the North	198
The capacity of the Goidel and of the Pict for political organization	200

CHAPTER VI.

THE ETHNOLOGY OF EARLY BRITAIN.

The name Albion	202
The spelling and history of the names, Britain, Britannia, &c.... ..	205
Original meaning of Britanni , Brittones , &c.	209
Classification of the Celtic nations based on Celtic phono- logy	213
The parts of Britain which were Brythonic and Goidelic respectively	216
The same enumeration continued, with indications of traces of the earlier inhabitants	219
The situation of the various tribes of the North	222
Ptolemy's account of Britain: the position of the Caledo- nian Forest	224
Celtic proper names with p in Early Britain, either Bry- thonic or non-Celtic	226
Other distinctions of a similar nature	229
The treatment of cs or x supplying another probable test... ..	231
The topography of Britain affected by the legends about Arthur and Finn respectively	234

CHAPTER VII.

THE ETHNOLOGY OF BRITAIN CONTINUED.

Probable history of the term Picti	Page 238
The name Scotti	240
The Goidels of Britain partly invaders from Ireland : remarks on the ancient sepulchral monuments of Wales	245
The distribution of early Goidelic inscriptions in Wales	252
The Brythons probably buried in barrows	258
Some Goidelic names non-Aryan in point of origin or of formula	260
The language of the non-Celtic Aborigines spoken in his- torical times in Britain	269
Race more persistent than language	276

APPENDIX.

Additional notes on some of the names in the text	... 277
---	---------

INDEX	315
-----------------	-----

MAPS, &c.

- A coloured map of Britain, showing the relative positions of its chief peoples during the Roman occupation.
- Ptolemy's "British Isles."
- Strabo's "Western Europe."
- Wales in deaneries of the time of Henry VIII.
- A plate with engravings of five coins, accompanied by a brief letterpress description of each.

THE COINS.

- No. 1 represents a gold stater of Philip II. of Macedon, with the wreathed bust of Apollo on the obverse, and a charioteer in a biga on the reverse: underneath is the name of Philip, ΦΙΛΙΠΠΟΥ. Page 19.
- No. 2 is an early British imitation of the stater: the coin is in Mr. Evans's collection, but the place of finding is unknown. Among other things it will be noticed that it has been attempted to make the charioteer into a winged figure of Victory, and that the two horses have been converted into one horse with eight legs. Page 19.
- No. 3 is also in Mr. Evans's collection, and was found at Leighton Buzzard in 1849. Besides that the faces look the other way, it will be noticed that the place occupied by Philip's name on the original is in this instance devoted to a kind of ornamentation, which at a distance has somewhat the appearance of letters. Page 19.
- No. 4 is a coin of Addedomaros, a part of whose name is to be read AΘΘ||D on the reverse. On the obverse the face has given way to the coiffure which has developed into a sort of cross. Page 36.
- No. 5 is a coin of the Parisi, and it is to be seen at the York Museum. The obverse is taken up by the coiffure, so that it shows no part of the face. The reverse represents a very peculiar horse, accompanied by the legend VEP CORF. Page 41.

1

2

3

4

5

1

2

CELTIC BRITAIN.

CHAPTER I.

BRITAIN IN THE TIME OF JULIUS CÆSAR.

THE Celts form, in point of speech, a branch of the great group of nations which has been variously called Aryan, Indo-European, Indo-Germanic, Indo-Celtic, and Japhetic, while the other branches are represented by the Italians, the Greeks, the Teutons, the Litu-Slaves, the Armenians, the Persians, and the chief peoples of Hindustan. The respective places of these nations in the geography of the Old World give, roughly speaking, a very fair idea of their relative nearness to one another as to language. Thus the gulf is widest between the Celtic languages and Sanskrit or Zend, and narrowest between Celtic and Latin, while it is comparatively narrow between the Celtic and Teutonic languages, among which is included English, the speech destined in time to supersede the still living idioms of the insular Celt. Now the Celts of antiquity who appeared first and oftenest in history were those of Gallia, which, having been modified by the French into Gaule, we term Gaul. It included the France and Switzerland of the present day, and much territory besides. This people had various names. One of them was Galli, which in their language meant warriors or brave men, and seems to have been always used by the Romans to designate them ; but some of the Gauls in Cæsar's time preferred the name which he wrote Celtæ. This may have been synonymous with the other, and so it would appear to have meant warriors, its origin, if Aryan, being probably the same as that of the Old Norse hild-r, war, battle ; but the word would admit of being explained as originally of the same meaning as Brittones, of which we shall have to speak later. Recent writers, however, are of opinion that the terms Galli and Celtæ argue an ancient distinction of race ; that the latter at first applied exclusively to the aborigines who were non-Aryans, while the Galli only came in as the Aryan invaders of their country ; and that the two races only became one nation by a long process of amalgamation. As might be expected, ancient authors commonly mix up the two names, and from that of the Celtæ of old modern writers have derived the terms Celt and Celtic, which are employed in speaking of the family in its widest sense. This would be a further extension of the meaning of the old word, as Britain was considered to be outside the Celtic world. It was an island beyond Celtica, or over against it, as the ancients were wont to say.

It is a long time ago since the first Celts crossed the sea to settle in Britain. Nobody knows how long, so the guesses which have been made as to the date are hardly worth recording. And when they did come the immigration was not all over in one year or even in one century. The invasions may, however, be grouped into two, and looked at as made by peoples of both branches of the Celtic family. For as the Teutonic nations divide themselves into High Dutch, Nether Dutch, and Scandinavians, so the Celtic family, as far back as we can trace it into the darkness of antiquity, consisted of two groups or branches with linguistic features of their own which marked them off from one another. To the one belonged the ancestors of the people who speak Gaelic in Ireland, the Isle of Man, and the Highlands of the North, a language which existed also in Wales and Devon in the sixth century, and probably later. The national name which the members of this group have always given themselves, so far as one knows, is that of Gaidhel, pronounced and spelt in English Gael, but formerly written by themselves Goidel. So, as there is a tendency in this country to understand by the word Gael the Gael of the North alone, we shall speak of the group generally as Goidels and Goidelic. The other group is represented in point of speech by the people of Wales and the Bretons; formerly, one might have added the Welsh of Cumbria, and till the last century some of those of Cornwall. The national name of those speaking these dialects was that of Briton; but, since that word has now no precise meaning, we take the Welsh form of it, which is Brython, and call this group Brythons and Brythonic, whenever it may be needful to be exact. The ancient Gauls must also be classified with them, since the Brythons may be regarded as Gauls who came over to settle in Britain. Moreover, the language of most of the country south of the Forth, where English now prevails, probably differed little at the time of the Roman conquest from that of the Gauls of the Continent. This form of Celtic afterwards spread itself by degrees among the Goidels in the west of the island ; so that the later Brythons there cannot be regarded as wholly Brythons in point of blood, a very considerable proportion of them being probably Goidels using the language of the other Celts. Roughly speaking, however, one may say that the whole Celtic family was made up of two branches or groups, the Goidelic group and the Gallo-Brythonic one ; and every Celt of the United Kingdom is, so far as language is concerned, either a Goidel or a Brython. The Goidels were undoubtedly the first Celts to come to Britain, as their geographical position to the west and north of the others would indicate, as well as the fact that no trace of them has ever been identified on the Continent. They had probably been in the island for centuries when the Brythons, or Gauls, came and drove them westward. The Goidels, it is right to say, had done the same with another people, for there is no reason to suppose that when they came here, they found the country without inhabitants. Thus we get at least three peoples to deal with—two Celtic and one pre-Celtic ; and a great difficulty in writing the history of early Britain arises from the circumstance that the ancient authors, on whom we have to rely for our information, never troubled themselves to make nice distinctions between these races, though they were probably in different stages of civilization. We shall, therefore, proceed at once to give the substance of what they have put on record respecting this country, and make what use we can of ancient coins or other relics of the past to supplement that information about the island, seizing as we go on every opportunity of distinguishing between the different races peopling it. When the reader has thus become acquainted with the leading facts, something will be added by way of a more detailed account of our ethnology.

No such islands as Britain and Ireland were known to Herodotus in the fifth century before the Christian era ; but some time afterwards one of the Scipios of Rome visited Marseilles¹ and Narbonne to find out whether trade could not be established with the region beyond southern Gaul, so as to injure the Carthaginians, whose sailors used to bring tin, not only from Spain and the Cassiterides or the tin islands on the north-west of that peninsula, but also from Gaul. The Roman could not, however, get any information about the north, but the idea of a voyage of discovery took form among the merchants of Marseilles, and the result was, that they fitted out an expedition accompanied by an eminent mathematician of that city, with whose name the reader should be familiar as that of one of the most intrepid explorers the world has seen. This was Pytheas,² who lived in the time of Alexander the Great and Aristotle, the latter of whom died in the year 322 B.C., while the year 330 is guessed as the date of the floruit of Pytheas. The publication of the history of his travels is supposed to have taken place soon after the death of Aristotle; and fragments of the diary of his voyage have been preserved to us in the works of various ancient authors. Pytheas sailed round Spain to Brittany, and thence to Kent and other parts of Britain; next he set out from the Thames to the mouth of the Rhine, and thence he rounded Jutland, proceeding east so far as the mouth of the Vistula: he turned back from there and possibly coasted Norway. Finally he returned to Britain and sailed then to Brittany, whence he reached the mouth of the Garonne, where he found a route over land to Marseilles. / Thus Pytheas was in Britain twice, and paid more attention to it than to any of the other countries he visited; but he does not seem to have been so far as the tin districts in the west, and it is remarkable that he gives no hint which would lead one to suppose that there was any communication between them and the Continent. That intercourse, it would seem, was confined to the south-east of the island, where the Channel was narrowest. Pytheas took a great many observations in Britain; but, owing to the nature of the instruments which were then in use, they are of no value. It is quite otherwise with regard to what he says of the inhabitants: he saw plenty of corn in the fields in the south-east, and he noticed that the farmers gathered the sheaves into large barns, in which the threshing was done. They had so little sun that the open threshing-floors of the brighter south would not have done in a land of clouds and rain like Britain. He likewise found that they made a drink¹ by mixing wheat and honey, which is the mead still known in certain parts of Wales ; and he is supposed to have been the authority for their use of another drink, which Greek writers² speak of as made of barley and used instead of wine. The name by which it was known to them is still the Celtic word for beer : it was formerly curmi, and it now makes cuirm in Irish, and curw in Welsh. Thus we have ample evidence that in the fourth century before our era the Aryan farmer had made himself thoroughly at home in Britain. Now the expedition of Pytheas had been got up for practical purposes by his fellow-citizens, the Greeks of Marseilles, and it resulted undoubtedly in the extension across Gaul of their trade, directly or indirectly, to the corner of Britain nearest to the Continent. Some light, it may be added, is shed on this by the fact, that the first coins supposed to have been struck in the island, long as that happened after Pytheas's time, were all modelled after Greek coins made during his time. This points to a trade then opened with the north.³

¹ Strabo, Δ, 2, 1 (C. 190).

² For a fuller account of Pytheas see Elton's "Origins of Eng. Hist." (London, 1882), pp. 13, &c., and the extracts at the end of that volume.

Some two centuries later another Greek of note extended his travels to the island and visited Belerion,⁴ as he called the district in Cornwall where

¹ Strabo, Δ, 5, 5 (C. 201).

² Among others, Athenæus and Dioscorides : see Diefenbach's "Origines Europææ," s. v. cervesia.

³ See Evans's "Coins of the Ancient Britons," p. 24.

⁴ Diod. Siculus's "Bibliotheca Historica," v. 21, 22.

tin was found. This was Posidonius, with whom Cicero studied at Rhodes. Besides his description of the people and their method of working the tin, Posidonius is supposed to have been the authority of Diodorus Siculus¹ for stating that the inhabitants of Britain lived in mean dwellings made for the most part of reeds or wood, and that harvest with them meant cutting the ears of corn off and storing them in pits underground, whence were fetched day by day to be dressed for food what had been longest in keeping. This appears to have been a way of preparing the cereal for food, which was well understood in the last century in the Western Islands of Scotland, where one proceeded so skilfully to prepare the corn with the aid of a flame, that it might be dressed, winnowed, ground, and baked within an hour after reaping.² Posidonius would seem to have been speaking of a part of the country more remote than the south-east corner, to which the words of Pytheas probably applied. But we have now come down to the time when the Romans began to acquaint themselves with the island in a very tangible fashion.

— Late in the summer of the year 55 B.C., Julius Cæsar resolved to cross over to Britain,³ from which he understood the Gauls to have had repeated help in their wars with him. The season for waging war was, it is true, nearly over for that year, but he thought it desirable to visit the island, to see the people, and ascertain, so to say, how the land lay before him. So he tried first to extract information from traders about the size of the island, and the kind of people that lived there, together with their mode of warfare and manner of life; also as to what harbours they had for a number of ships of the larger size; but it was all in vain, and he says that no one but merchants readily crossed over, and that they only knew the coast and the districts opposite Gaul. He therefore sent Volusenus, one of his officers, out in a war-ship, to get as much information as possible respecting the coast of Britain, whence he was to return as soon as he could. In the meantime Cæsar collected vessels from all parts, together with the fleet which had been engaged the summer before against the Veneti, to a port in the country of the Morini, from which the passage to Britain could be most readily made. News of this had been at once carried across, and ambassadors from many of the states in the island came to Cæsar, which shows that there was a much readier and more intimate communication between it and Gaul than Cæsar's words would have led one to anticipate. The ambassadors promised him hostages, and the submission of their states to the Roman people. Cæsar, after making liberal promises and exhorting them to continue of that mind, sent them home, accompanied by Comnios. This man was one of the Atrebates, whom Cæsar had made king over that Belgic people when they were conquered by the legions, and his rule was afterwards extended to the Morini. Commios was chosen for his supposed fidelity to Roman interests, and because he had great influence in the south of Britain, where a portion of the people of the Atrebates had settlements. He had also, in Cæsar's opinion, proved himself a man of valour and prudence. His orders were to visit as many states as possible, and to exhort them to embrace the alliance of the Roman people; but no sooner had Commios landed, and his business become known, than he was placed in bonds. On the return of Volusenus with such information as a man who had not ventured to land was able to procure, Cæsar, at midnight on the 24th of August or one of the two succeeding days, embarked with two legions or about 12,000 men, in about eighty ships, together with a number of galleys, leaving eighteen ships detained at a neighbouring port by a contrary wind: these were to follow with the cavalry as soon as they could. Cæsar reached the British shore betimes in the morning; but, finding the point touched an unfavourable place to land in the face of the enemy that mustered in force on the cliffs around, he coasted about seven Roman miles to a spot where there was an open beach and a level strand. The native cavalry and charioteers, closely followed by the rest of the British forces, were there in time to contest the landing of the legions. A severe engagement followed, in which the Roman soldiers showed considerable hesitation, and were thrown into much confusion by the British charioteers, with whose movements they were not familiar. Gradually, however, as the Roman soldiers got a firm footing, they forced the natives to retreat ; and Cæsar bewails the absence of his cavalry, which he required to complete his victory. Afterwards ambassadors came to him to sue for peace, with Comnios, released from bonds, at their head. They laid the war to the charge of the multitude, and begged Cæsar to forgive those who knew no better : he met this with the truly Roman complaint, that, after they had sent ambassadors of their own free will to him on the Continent, they had attacked him without cause ; but he granted their request with a demand for hostages. Some were given on the spot, and others were to come from a distance in a few days, while the leading men surrendered themselves and began to send their troops home.

¹ "Bibl. Hist.," v. 21, 22.

² See Elton's "Origins of Eng. Hist.," p. 33, where he quotes from Martin's "Description of the Western Islands of Scotland," published in 1703, a passage illustrative of this practice. See also, with regard to Ireland, Tylor's "Primitive Culture," (2nd ed.) i. p. 44.

³ Cæsar, "De Bello Gallico," iv. 20-38.

While this was going on, the eighteen ships bringing the cavalry across appeared, when such a storm arose that they were all forced in the face of night to turn back to the harbour they had left, after some of them had had a narrow escape from being wrecked on the coast west of Cæsar's camp. Moreover, as it was full moon, there followed such a tide that the tempest filled with water the war-galleys which had been drawn up on shore, and dashed together the transport ships that lay at anchor, so that many were wrecked or made unfit for immediate use. By dint of hard work and with the aid of the timber and the bronze of the vessels that had been wrecked, Cæsar was able to get all but twelve passably refitted, while he sent to Gaul for the things that were wanting. As soon as the British chiefs saw what had happened to the Roman cavalry and to the ships, and when they had reckoned by the size of the camp how few soldiers it contained, they began to combine and secretly to muster their forces again, as well as to stop sending in hostages, hoping, as Cæsar thought, that they could prolong the war into the winter, and thereby cut off his whole army, as a caution to all future invaders. Their first move was to post cavalry and chariots in good positions near the spot where alone there was corn still standing, to which the Romans must come. In due time one of the legions came, and as soon as the men had set to work in the fields, a well-directed onslaught was made on them, and it would have gone hard with the legion, as it was attacked on all sides, had not Cæsar, who was on the alert, brought them aid. The attack then ceased, but he was only able to conduct a retreat. Then bad weather is said by him to have kept both sides quiet for several days, during which the British forces seem to have received reinforcements. They now advanced to Cæsar's camp, which was by this time provided with thirty horses which Commios had brought over: a battle ensued, in which the Romans prevailed and slew a considerable number of the enemy in their retreat. After the soldiers had duly laid waste the country around, and destroyed everything they could, ambassadors came the same day to sue again for peace: it was readily granted, but he asked for twice the number of hostages demanded the time before; for the general was getting impatient to return to Gaul, the reason assigned being the lateness of the season and the frail nature of his ships.

He had probably seen that he could not do much in the island without a larger force, especially of cavalry. He left shortly before the equinox, so that he had been here nearly a month according to some calculations, or a little over a fortnight according to others, but without having been able to advance a mile from the place of landing. The hostages were to be sent after him, and those of two states reached him, but no more. Nevertheless, the Roman senate, on learning by letter from him what he had achieved, thought it right to decree twenty days of public thanksgiving.

Cæsar¹ gave orders that more ships and those of a more suitable kind should be got ready for the ensuing summer for a second campaign in Britain ; and such was the eagerness with which the soldiers went to work, that by the time he returned in June from Illyricum and Italy, they had got nearly 600, new and old, almost ready to be launched. Thus it would appear that what they had seen of the island had filled them with thoughts of valuable plunder : the same feeling is proved also by the privateers, which those who were able fitted out to accompany the army across the Channel. Among other things it was thought that British waters would be found to produce abundance of precious pearls, an idea got rid of, no doubt, in time, though we read of British pearls adorning a corselet which Cæsar was pleased to dedicate in the temple of the Goddess of Victory at Rome. When all was ready he embarked at a place he calls Portus Itius, or the Ictian port, which was probably the harbour whence he had sailed before, with five legions and 2,000 cavalry: the number of vessels of all kinds was over 800, though 60 built on the Marne, in the country of the Meldi above the Parisii, had failed to join the expedition, owing to a storm which drove them back. This year Cæsar was resolved to begin in season: accordingly he set sail, as it is supposed, late on the 18th of July or, according to others, a day or two later, but by daybreak he found his fleet carried by the current past the South Foreland, and it was with great labour that he got back to the spot which had been ascertained the summer before to be the best place for landing: this work, together with the choice of a site for the camp, took up the rest of the day. During the night, however, he set out with all the army, except what force he thought needful to leave in charge of the camp and the ships moored near it, in quest of the enemy that had this time thought it of no use to contest the landing of such a force, but rather to take up an advantageous position inland. Cæsar, after marching about twelve miles in the night, came in sight of the Britons, and soon found them advancing to attack his men from a higher ground. On being repulsed by the Roman cavalry they withdrew into a place excellently fortified by nature and art, with all its entrances blocked up with felled trees: it appeared to have been made during one of their civil wars. The legions made themselves in due time masters of it, but Cæsar would not venture to pursue the enemy far that day. Next morning, as he was sending cavalry and infantry after the retreating Britons, news arrived from the coast that nearly all his ships had been dashed to pieces on the shore during the night. He called back his men and marched to the coast, where he found that about forty ships had been wrecked, but that the rest might be repaired with great labour: this is done, and they are hauled on shore to be included within the lines of the camp. About ten days are taken up by this work, during which word is sent to Cæsar's lieutenant in Gaul to have as many ships as possible got ready and sent over. When at length the general returns to seek the enemy, he finds him mustering in much greater force under the command now of a single leader named Cassivelaunos, whose country lay north of the Thames, being in all probability that of the people called Catuvelauni. This prince, though he had in previous years been at constant war with the other states, had now the sole command given him by the consent of all, whence it would seem that they acknowledged him to have been their ablest and most tried general. What gave Cæsar most trouble would seem to have been the quick and sudden movements of the British cavalry and charioteers, who fought bravely with the Roman cavalry; they were as dangerous when retreating as when advancing, for when they got the cavalry of the Roman army away from it, the combatants alighted and fought as foot soldiers. On one occasion the charioteers rushed upon the Roman soldiers, when they were engaged in fortifying their position, and fought so strenuously with the outposts before the camp, that the first cohorts of two different legions had to be called out ; but when they had taken their places with small spaces between them they were terrified by the enemy's charioteers, who dashed through their midst in safety and with the utmost boldness. It was only after one of the military tribunes had been killed, and more cohorts had come forth, that the enemy retreated. They never fought in close order, but they arranged outlying detachments that harassed the legions in relays. So the next day no less than three legions were sent out together for the purpose of foraging ; but, owing to the Roman cavalry being then better backed than before by the infantry, severe losses were inflicted on the skirmishers ; and the British auxiliaries, who had mustered in great number, straightway withdrew ; nor did Cassivelaunos after that day hazard a battle on a large scale. Consequently Cæsar marched towards his territory and crossed the Thames, somewhere above London, with great difficulty, but with much alacrity on the part of the soldiers, who had had as yet little chance of getting much booty. Cassivelaunos sent away most of his forces, but retained about 4,000 charioteers to harass Cæsar's march and to clear the country where he was likely to come : his tactics greatly narrowed the Roman area of devastation, and made the business of burning and destroying much more laborious than the soldiers could have wished ; so their general speaks almost pathetically of their being only able to effect their purpose in the midst of the toils of marching.

¹ "Bell. Gall.," v. 1-23.

Rhye

This was, however, not to last long ; for the powerful people of the Trinovantes, who inhabited the modern county Essex and a part of Middlesex, from beyond the Lea to the Stour, sent in the meantime to Cæsar to ask for peace, a course which they were led to take partly, no doubt, to escape the ravages of the Roman army, and partly perhaps to avenge themselves on Cassivelaunos, who had killed their king. The son of the latter, who was called Mandubratios, had succeeded in making his way to Cæsar in Gaul, and in securing his protection; the Trinovantes, therefore, not only asked Cæsar to accept their submission, but also to send Mandubratios to rule over them, and to save that prince from Cassivelaunos. Cæsar complies, and demands forty hostages from them, together with corn for the army: they bring both, and their territory is protected from the soldiery. The work of conquest was now easy; for the example of the Trinovantes was followed by other tribes, namely, the Cenimagni, Segontiaci, Ancalites, Bibroci, and Cassi, while the invader was told that the stronghold of Cassivelaunos was not far off, where he would find a large number of men and cattle brought together. This he discovered to have been admirably fortified by nature and art, which latter in Britain consisted in making a defence of wood, with a rampart and trench drawn round it. But it was not long before the Roman soldiers got possession of the place, together with the large number of cattle it contained, while many of the men were cut down in their flight. But Cassivelaunos was also active, and while these things were going on in his own territory, he ordered the four kings of Cantion, or Kent, together with a part of Surrey, to storm Cæsar's camp by the sea, a thing which they at once proceeded to do; but they were driven back with a considerable loss, one of the leaders being captured by the Roman soldiers. At the news of this failure, and especially of the defection of the Trinovantes and the other states which followed them, Cassivelaunos decided to sue for peace through Commios, the Atrebat. Rumours from Gaul, not to his liking, had reached Cæsar, and because he had his former views as to the lateness of the season, he seized the opportunity of bringing the war to a close at once, by demanding hostages, and fixing the sum which Britain was to pay as a yearly tribute. He also gave Cassivelaunos strict orders, which cost the giver little, to keep his hands off Manbratios and the Trinovantes. Since it was near the equinox when Cæsar left, his stay here must have been about two months. Of course he did not depart empty-handed, for he took with him not only the hostages, but also a great number of captives, the sale of whom was to fill Roman coffers with gold.

From Cæsar's departure in the year 54 B.C. down to the invasion of the island under Claudius in A.D. 43, that is to say, for pretty nearly a century, we have very little of its history, except what may be made out by means of the coins, which began to be stamped with letters soon after Cæsar's conquest of Gaul. The coinage of Britain had in the first instance been modelled after that of Gaul, which in its turn can be traced to the Phocæan Greeks of Massilia or Marseilles, through whom the continental Gauls became acquainted in the latter part of the fourth century before Christ with the gold stater of Philip II. of Macedon. This was a fine coin, weighing about 133 grains and having on one side the head of Apollo wreathed with laurel, while the other showed a charioteer in his chariot, with Philip's name underneath. It was imitated by the Gauls fairly well at first, but as it got further removed from the original in time and place, the figures degenerated into very curious and fantastic forms. It has been calculated by John Evans, the greatest authority on the subject, that the inhabitants of the south of Britain must have begun to coin gold pieces of this kind from 200 to 150 B.C.,¹ and the information he has collected makes it probable that this took place first in Kent; next follows the coinage of the other tribes inhabiting the south of England, as far as the borders of Dorsetshire. It is also worthy of remark that coins of several types are found to have been current on the south coast, concerning which it is hard to decide whether they should be regarded as belonging to Gaul or to Britain. Money appears to have circulated as far as Cornwall, though there is no satisfactory evidence that any tribe west of the Durotriges of Dorset had a coinage of its own. Between Dorsetshire and the Worcestershire Avon, there were probably more than one tribe that had an early coinage. So had the Catuvelauni, whose territory stretched in a north-easterly direction from the Thames to the neighbourhood of the Wash, and also the Trinovantes, who lived between them and the North Sea in Essex and Middlesex.^S But there is no satisfactory evidence that any tribes north of these, not even the Eцени, who occupied what is now Norfolk and Suffolk, had a coinage of their own when Cæsar landed in this country; nor does it appear that any British tribe whatever had then begun to have its coins lettered. It is not certain that silver or bronze coins had as yet been struck, though it is probable that in any case they came into use much later than gold ones. But Cæsar is usually made to say that no money was current in Britain, but only bronze or pieces of iron of a fixed weight to supply its place. The passage,¹ however, is hopelessly corrupt, and the manuscripts differ greatly, some of them ascribing to the Britons the use of coins of gold, and some also of bronze. Whatever Cæsar wrote there can be little doubt about the gold currency: he appears, from the best manuscripts, to have mentioned it, though he saw little of it, as may be gathered from the correspondence² of one of his officers; and it is by no means improbable that ingots of bronze or bars of iron may have been used for money among the tribes who had no coinage, and that Cæsar was aware of that fact. When he goes on to say that iron was found on the sea-coast of Britain, but that the supply was small, he probably alludes to the iron-mining in the weald of Kent and Sussex, which Prof. Boyd Dawkins believes to have been carried on before Cæsar's landing, as it certainly was during the Roman occupation, and for many centuries afterwards.¹ There is no reason, however, to suppose that the great wealth of the country in iron ore had been discovered by Cæsar's time, and the little already found had possibly been pointed out by some one who had seen iron worked on the Continent. Cæsar tells us that the bronze used in the island was imported, which is a pretty good proof that copper was not yet worked here, bronze being a compound of copper and tin. The importation of bronze and exportation of tin must have formed at this time the most important items in the trade of Britain. ✓

¹ Evans's "Coins of the Ancient Britons" (London, 1864), p. 26.

¹ "Bell. Gall.," v. 12.

² That of Cicero's brother to Cicero; see "Monumenta Hist. Brit.," pp. lxxxvii., lxxxviii.

We have now come to an age when the coins of Britain began to appear with letters on them. This is found to have taken place first in Kent, or else a little to the west on the southern shore, where the Belgic tribes kept up an active communication with Gaul. Here we find one or two coins of Commios, and a great many of three princes who called themselves sons of Commios. Who this Commios was is not known, but he and his sons seem to have held sway in much the same part of Britain in which the Commios of whom Cæsar speaks had so much influence; and, on the whole, it is not improbable that the latter is also the Commios of the coins. He appears to have gone back with ¹ The last forge appears to have been blown out only in the year 1825, though the growing scarcity of fuel had driven several of the ironmasters to South Wales so early as the time of Henry VIII. See a paper by Prof. Boyd Dawkins in the Transactions of the "Internat. Congress of Prehist. Arch." for 1868, p. 188.

Cæsar to Gaul, as we find him left with some cavalry to keep watch the following year over the Menapii, who seem to have lived on the coast between the Morini and the Rhine. This duty was entrusted him while the general set out against the Treveri; but in 52 B.C. so strong was the desire of the Gauls to drive out the Romans, that Commios became one of the leaders against the latter; and so dangerous was he considered, that Labienus, Cæsar's lieutenant, tried to have him killed by treachery; but he got away, though severely wounded. He is said some time afterwards to have had a very narrow escape from Cæsar himself, which he effected by betaking himself to his ship, and having its sails spread as though he had it already afloat, which it was not: the pursuit was given up, and he had time to get away to Britain. He figures, however, in 51 B.C. again, as one of the chief organizers of opposition to Roman rule in Gaul, and when the other chiefs had given in their submission, he still held out. It was again attempted to murder him, by means of the same officer as before, but the latter had the worst of it, and Commios escaped, whereupon he sent in his submission to Antony, then acting under Cæsar in Gaul, and made it a condition that he should be allowed to go where he should not set eyes on another Roman. He seems to have been an active man in the prime of life, and since we hear no more of him it is not unlikely that he came over to Britain, and that his hatred of the Romans had been sufficiently proved to his kindred here to make them forget his having once been one of Cæsar's tools, if, indeed, they ever took an unfavourable view of that part of his history. But we need not suppose that his influence here had to be acquired all anew, as the Atrebates and the other Belgic tribes of Britain had probably been induced by him to join the league which he and others had organized of their kinsfolk, the Continental Atrebates, the Bellovaci, and other powerful peoples. As far as can be gathered from the places of finding the coins in question, the rule of the Commian family did not extend beyond the district represented by Kent, Surrey, Sussex, Hants, and, perhaps, a part of Wilts. According to Mr. Evans the lettered coinage of this part of the island may be supposed to have appeared some time before 30 B.C.¹ At his death his territory seems to have fallen to his three sons, Tincommios, Verica, and Eppillos, who are supposed to have exercised a sort of joint rulership over it, while each had probably a district which was more completely under his own control; that is to say, Eppillos ruled over the Cantii, Tincommios over the Regni, whose territory may, roughly speaking, be supposed to have been that which became the Saxon kingdom of Sussex, and Verica over the country of the Atrebates, who appear to have in all possessed what is now Berkshire, a part of Oxfordshire reaching so far north as Aldchester and Bicester, and a certain portion possibly of Surrey. The names of the three brothers are found together on one coin, but Tincommios, who seems to have been the eldest, ap-

¹ Evans's "Coins of the Ancient Britons," pp. 154, 155.

+
appears to have died before the others, as some coins occur with their joint names alone. There are reasons for supposing Eppillos to have survived Verica, of whose territory, together most likely with that of Tincommios, he may have become sole ruler : at any rate, he appears, so far as one can judge from the abbreviated forms used on some coins, to call himself king of Calleva, which is identified with Silchester in Hampshire. There is no indication that Commios or Tincommios called himself king of any people in Britain, but Eppillos and Verica certainly take the title on some of their coins, whence it would seem that Commios had placed himself in a position of authority in South Britain as the head of a league organized for a special purpose, and that he so far consolidated his power as to be able to pass it on to his sons, while Eppillos and Verica appear to have thought themselves safe in taking the title of kings. That was probably not done without opposition, and it is not impossible that Eppillos's position among the Cantii was altogether acquired by conquest, either in his father's time or soon after, as it seems doubtful whether Cantion came within the circle of the original influence of Commios, whose direct connection would rather seem to have been with the Atrebates and the other Belgic tribes west of Cantion. We appear to fall in with one of the princes who were beaten in the struggle with the Commian family, in either of the British refugees who are said on the monuments¹ recounting the events of the reign of ¹ That of Ancyra in Asia Minor ; see the Berlin "Corpus Inscr. Lat.," iii. pp. 784, 785, 798, 799.

Augustus to have sought his protection. The coins of Commios, and some of the earlier ones of Tincommios, continued the degenerate imitations of the Macedonian stater without showing any Roman influence; but it was not long after Augustus became emperor, when Tincommios copied the Latin formula, in which the former styled himself Augustus Divi Filius or the son of his adoptive father, Julius Cæsar, who had now begun to be officially called Divus or the god. So Tincommios had inscribed on his money the legend—Tinc. Commi F., or even shorter abbreviations, meaning Tincommios, son of Commios; and the grotesque traits derived from the stater soon disappear in favour of classical designs of various kinds, proving very distinctly that the influence of Roman art was beginning to make itself felt in the south of Britain. With the sons of Commios the coinage of the western portion of their territory seems to have ceased, whereas in Kent it would appear to have continued later. This is supposed to be accounted for by the influence of the trade with Gaul, where everything was fast being Romanized under Augustus; but it would hardly explain why a native coinage should continue longer in Kent, which was after all the nearest part of Britain to Gaul. It is rather to be supposed that the western part of Eppillos's kingdom fell after his day under the power of the encroaching Catuvelauni, and that we have to look for the coins representing it later among those of that people.

Now most of the latter are found to have been issued by a prince, whose name occurs Latinized as Tasciovanus, Tasciovanius, and Tasciovans (genitive Tasciovantis), the Tenuantius of Geoffrey of Monmouth, and by his sons Cunobelinos and Epaticcus. The father's capital was Verlamion or Verulam, near St. Albans, and the name of the town appears on many of his coins, as does that of Camulodunon or Colchester, which was Cunobelinos's capital, on his. The great variety of Tasciovant's coins seem to show that he must have had a long reign, and some of them at any rate were struck so late as the year 13 B.C., as they are found to have been modelled after coins of Augustus, which were not current till that time;¹ but it has been supposed that he lived a good many years later, and died only after the beginning of our era. Others of his coins show that he reigned for some time during the life of Eppillos, but at what date he began we have no means of finding out, though it has been supposed to have been so early as the year 30, when Augustus was made emperor, and some of the coins would seem to point even to an earlier date. This would bring Tasciovant sufficiently near Cassivelaunos in point of time for him to have been his son or a brother's son; but possibly we should rather say a grandson. In either case, there is no reason to suppose that there had in the meantime been a revolution or a change of dynasty, especially as we find Cunobelinos, the Cymbeline of Shakspeare, styling himself on some coins rex or king; and we seem to be at liberty to assume in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the people of the Catuvelauni had been guided by the more or less uniform policy of one dynasty in their treatment of neighbouring states. This appears on looking into the scanty data at our disposal to have been one of conquest and aggression. Thus Cæsar mentions how the king of the Trinovantes had been slain by Cassivelaunos, when his son Mandubratios fled to him. How long the losses which Cassivelaunos and his people suffered during Cæsar's campaign inclined them to leave the Trinovantes alone cannot be made out, but we learn from the coins that Cunobelinos ruled there and had made Camulodunon in the heart of their country his capital, which probably happened during Tasciovant's life and with his help. Possibly Mandubratios was left unassailed so long as he lived; but the coinage of the country of the Trinovantes bears evidence to the rule for a time of a prince whose name was Dubnovelaunos, and who is mentioned on the Augustan monument, already referred to, as one of the two British princes who sought the emperor's protection. But his history is rendered somewhat difficult by the fact that his coins are also found in Kent (and those so far as can be guessed his earlier ones) whence it would seem that he ruled over a certain extent of territory on both sides of the Thames. From his southern position he may have been driven by Eppillos, with whom he appears to have been contemporary, and from the northern one some time later by Cunobelinos. It is not impossible that the territory of the Trinovantes originally comprised a part of the southern coast of the estuary of the Thames, and certain it is that both the Isle of Thanet and that of Sheppey are placed opposite the Trinovantes by Ptolemy, who may, perhaps, have regarded them as belonging to that people.

¹ Evans's "Coins of the Anc. Brit.," p. 223.

✓ Between the Catuvelauni and the North Sea there were, besides the Trinovantes, the people of the Eцени, occupying the country between them and the Wash. When the former had been reduced by the Catuvelauni, the turn of the latter, in case it had not gone before, could not be very far off: so it may be that we have them heading Cæsar's list of the states which, after the example of the Trinovantes, deserted Cassivelaunos in the hour of need. But that is by no means certain, since the name appears in the manuscripts of Cæsar as Cenimagni, Cenomagni and Cenomanni, which may possibly be considered mutilated forms of some such longer title of the nation of the Eцени as Eценimagni or the like; but it may be that he meant a Belgic tribe from the south of the Thames. The others mentioned were the Segontiaci, Ancalites, Bibroci, and Cassi, all probably Belgic tribes, living near the Thames or between its basin and the Severn, and included as it may be supposed under the more general name of Atrebates. Such the Bibroci appear to have been, whose name reminds one of the town of the Remi, called Bibrax, and of Cæsar's statement, that almost all the Belgic peoples of Britain bore the name of the Continental state they had come from; but the exact locality neither of the Bibroci nor of the Ancalites can be said to be known, though nothing serious stands in the way of the guess which identifies the name of the former with the Berroc, whence the modern name of the county of Berks is derived. The Segontiaci are identified with the neighbourhood of the Silchester Calleva by the finding there of a Roman inscription in honour of a divinity styled the Segontiac Hercules, and as some of Tasciovant's coins bear the name of this people, or of one of its towns, we may conclude that they had been forced into an alliance with the Catuvelauni. This does not stand alone; for the coins of Epaticcus seem to prove that he held sway south of the Thames, in what is now the county of Surrey. The name of the Cassi would be lisped in Gaulish and then spelt CADDI or CAΘΘI, which less accurately written in Latin letters may be detected in the Catti of coins found in Gloucestershire and the neighbouring county of Monmouth. They were either a branch of the Atrebates, or else, perhaps, of the people of the Dobunni, to whom they were near neighbours. The latter occupied most of the tract between the two Avons and between the Severn and the states of the Atrebates and the Catuvelauni, while Dion Cassius in speaking of the campaign of Aulus Plautius in that district in the year 43 gives one to understand, ~~that~~ either the whole or a portion of the people of the Dobunni was subject to the Catuvelauni at that time. The inland tract between the Catuvelauni and the Dobunni on the one hand, and the tribes grouping themselves with the Brigantes of the north beyond the Humber and the Mersey on the other, was inhabited by two peoples, that of the Coritani in the lower part of the valley of the Trent and the district between it and the North Sea, and the Cornavii to the west of the Coritani, and reaching from about the Worcestershire Avon to the mouths of the Dee and the Mersey. Of these peoples exceedingly little is known, and they play no appreciable part in the resistance offered to the Roman arms in the time of Claudius, so we may, perhaps, infer that they were virtually conquered with the Catuvelauni, as having been for some time the allies or subjects of that state. In that case the Catuvelauni may be regarded as the Mercians of those days, a supposition aptly illustrated by the fact that they chose to call themselves by a name meaning battle-rulers or war-kings, like that of the Caturiges of Gaul; and it is in their aggressiveness that we have probably to look for the secret in the first instance of the influence of Commios in Britain, which Cæsar has left unexplained. The Belgic tribes of the Thames Valley were, we may take it, hard pressed by the Catuvelauni; they send to ask their kindred in Gaul for help, and Commios comes over to aid them with his genius, and possibly with armed men; but whether that was so or not—for there is no evidence—there would be nothing very surprising in a man of his ability having organized such resistance as would stay for a time the advance of the Catuvelauni. It may, indeed, be that he was not the first to come over for that purpose, but that something of the kind had happened already in the time of Diviciacos, who, as Cæsar was informed, had been king of the Belgic people of the Suessiones within his time, and not only possessed more power than any other man in Gaul, but exercised it also in Britain.¹ However that may be, Commios may have seen that the advance of the Catuvelauni could not be long stayed, and that it was his reason, or at least one of his reasons, for taking an active part in Cæsar's invasion. If so, it may be that the losses which Cæsar inflicted on the Cantii and the Catuvelauni, resulted in relieving the Belgic states of all immediate fear of their neighbours, and in adding to the popularity of Commios. In that case he would have little or no trouble in making himself the head of a league directed against the Catuvelauni, when he was forced to leave Gaul, whence he brought with him also the credit of intense hatred of the Romans. All this would agree well enough with the fact that it was probably among the people of Kent that he was detained in bonds, when he landed as Cæsar's envoy; and it has already been suggested that it was possibly by force of arms that his son Eppillos asserted his power there some time afterwards.

¹ "Bell. Gall.," ii. 4.

CHAPTER II.

BRITAIN DOWN TO THE CLAUDIAN CONQUEST.

FOR a good many years preceding the Claudian invasion in the year 43, Cunobelinus was the most conspicuous figure in Britain, and Suetonius, who wrote his history of the Cæsars some seventy or eighty years later, speaks of him as *Rex Britannorum*¹ or king of the Britons. From this, together with other indications, it would seem that his power reached to the southern coast, though it is hardly probable that he had removed all the princes of the states south of the Thames. It is more likely that he was satisfied with forcing them to an alliance with him, and allowing some of them to rule in their own states subject to some kind of supremacy on his part. Whether the fugitives who sought the aid of Augustus were able to induce him to assist them we are not told, but historians state that Augustus once meditated an expedition against Britain, and it may be that it was the representations of the former that led him thereto. This never came to anything, for the princes of Britain hastened to send ambassadors to him to prevent war, and some of them, we are told, gained his friendship. We may take it that Cunobelinus, the most wealthy and powerful of them, was the most successful in winning the emperor's good graces, and if the exiles ever returned it was probably subject to certain conditions which he thought it right to indicate. Strabo, who wrote not many years after the death of Augustus, in 14 B.C., goes on to say that the British princes who were on friendly terms with the emperor, dedicated their offerings in the Capitol at Rome, and brought the island well-nigh to a state of close connection with the Roman power. This is quite in harmony with what we learn from Cunobelinus's coins. His father's, which were much on a level with those of Eppillos, show far less of the influence of Rome, while it is unmistakable on those of Cunobelinus, with the exception of some few of his early ones, which are purely British, and belong to the series derived from the Macedonian stater. The workmanship improves, and a variety of classical figures, such as Jupiter Ammon, Apollo playing' on the lyre, Hercules with his club or with the trophies of some of his labours, Janus, Diana, Cybele on a lion, Victory in various attitudes, and many other mythical personages of the same class, together with sphinxes, griffins, and such monsters of southern mythology, take the place of the clumsier forms on the more purely British money. The coinage of Gaul was now becoming Roman, and the improvement in that of Britain was no longer perhaps so much a matter of taste as of commercial expediency, on which some light is thrown by the fact that Augustus thought proper to commute the year's tribute for a light export and import duty on the trade between it and Gaul. This, so far as it goes, would indicate that the trade was not inconsiderable. In any case, we are not to suppose the emperor capable of despising any source of income which could be made to bring money into his coffers.

¹ Suetonius, "De Vita Cæsarum," Caligula, 44.

Augustus was succeeded by Tiberius, who died in the year 37 without having troubled himself in any way, so far as we know, with the affairs of Britain. He was followed by Caligula, who was emperor until his death in the year 41. In his time Britain appears again in history, as follows:—In the year 40 a son of Cunobelinus, called Adminius by Suetonius, who gives the account, surrendered himself with a small number of followers to Caligula in Gaul, when he had for some reason or other been banished by his own father. Thereupon the emperor sent a letter to Rome describing in fine language how the island of Britain had been added to the Roman power, the messengers being charged to deliver his message to the senate only in full assembly in the Temple of Mars. This freak of imperial madness corroborates the view that Cunobelinus was at that time, in the opinion of the Romans, the only British king who was worth considering, and explains why Suetonius calls him king of the Britons. But of his son, who made this cheap surrender of his father's kingdom to Caligula, nothing further is known, excepting that he was possibly the same person whose name is written Amminus on some coins of this time, the finding-place of which tends to connect him with some part of Kent. Cunobelinos had other sons, but the only ones known to history were Togodumnos and Caratâcos, who ruled over their deceased father's kingdom when Claudius sent Aulus Plautius here. So he must have died between the years 40 and 43, at a very advanced age, and after having carried into effect with considerable success the family policy of reducing the neighbouring states under the rule of the Catuvelauni.

A variety of coins, of which neither the exact age or place of issue nor the sequence has been satisfactorily made out, are assigned to the country of the Dobunni ; but, on the whole, none of them are considered to date before the Christian era, while some appear to be as late as the time of Claudius, whose reign begins with the year 41. They tend to show that some of the Dobunni were so far independent of the Catuvelauni as to have had a coinage of their own. It may be, however, that the latest of them were struck after the death of Togodumnos in 43 and the conquest of his people by the Romans, that is, in the interval before the reduction of the country in the neighbourhood of the Bristol Avon by Ostorius Scapula in the year 50. They all belong to the series of imitations of the Macedonian stater, and show hardly a trace of the influence of Rome, excepting that two or three of the names are given in a Latin rather than in a Gaulish spelling. One group, that of the Catti, a word already mentioned as being probably the name of a people, the Cassi of Cæsar's

Commentaries, is remarkable as showing no trace of the name of any prince or king.

- The next region distinctly indicated by the peculiarities of its coinage is the country of the Eцени, consisting approximately of the modern counties of Norfolk and Suffolk. Trade and the east wind travelled westwards, leaving the Eцени on their peninsula to defy a little longer the Roman influence to which Cunobelinos and his people had been giving way, and which now reached the land of the Dobunni on the banks of the Severn. The Eцени seem, from what we read of them afterwards, to have been a remarkably hardy and warlike race, but, just as they may have been among those who deserted Cassivelaunos in order to make their own terms with Cæsar, so their old jealousy and fear of the power of the Catuvelauni when Cunobelinos had succeeded in combining with it that of the Trinovantes, were partly, no doubt, the cause which led them in 43 to make an alliance with the Romans, which they soon began to regret. The earliest group of coins which has been supposed to belong to them bears the name of Addedomaros; but it is by no means certain, that the prince so named ruled over the Eцени rather than over some neighbouring tribe, among whom Cunobelinos found the means of supplanting or succeeding him. His coins would then be the only gold ones of the Eцени with any reading on them, and, had they really been theirs, it is hardly probable that they would have reverted to uninscribed ones, for such they certainly seem to have had after his time, both in gold and silver. But together with their uninscribed silver coins they used inscribed ones, some of which are remarkable as showing the name of the people in the abbreviated form of ECEN without a trace of that of any prince or king accompanying it, which calls to mind the coins of the Catti. It would thus seem that at this time the Emeni had no kings. Their latest coins, however, show the name of one Antedrigus, who may have been king or else chief magistrate of a state which had no king: we cannot say which as there are no means of deciding. But if the following facts be put together, to wit, that Antedrigus, the name of this man, appears a little later, sometimes in its Celtic spelling and sometimes Latinized, on coins in the land of the Dobunni; that Dion Cassius¹ mentions one Bericos, who, driven out of Britain by an insurrection, went to persuade Claudius to send out an expedition against it, which was done in 43; and lastly that, when the Romans came, the Emeni entered into an alliance without fighting, though they were by no means a likely people to have shrunk from the horrors of war, their history may be guessed—that is all—and summarized thus:—The Emeni had experienced a revolution, which put an end to the kingly power among them; the state became the prey of two factions, headed by Bericos and Antedrigus respectively; their dispute may have been of the same nature as that which Julius Cæsar was called upon to decide among the Aedui,¹ between two nobles, each of whom insisted that he was the duly elected king for the year ; Antedrigus prevailed, and issued coins with his name on them ; and Bericos fled to Claudius to ask him to invade the island, promising him the aid of his friends and of the state of the Eceni if he placed him in the position occupied by his rival. When the Roman forces arrived, Bericos and his friends made a handle of the Eceni's jealousy of the power of the Catuvelauni to induce the former to enter into an alliance with the Roman power ; he obtained his desire, and Antedrigus had to flee, but was hospitably received by the Dobunni, among whom he organized resistance to the Romans for some years afterwards, much in the same way as Caratacos did among the Silures after having to leave his own people in the power of the conqueror. All this, though only a conjecture, would agree best with the view that the Eceni never were reduced by Cunobelinos ; and he certainly can have had no hand in regulating their coinage, which betrays no trace of the influence of Roman art or of the Latin language, except in so far as the Gaulish orthography used in this country at that time was a sort of mixture of Greek and Latin letters.

¹ "Roman History," ix. 19, 23.

Nothing can be said to be known as yet of the coinage of the Cornavii and the Coritani, though it is not improbable that both peoples may have had for a short time coins of their own make. In fact, it is thought that it was through the latter that acquaintance with money was first made by the people on the northern shore of the Humber, whose coinage is the rudest of all, and the one most like that of the Eцени, though it is impossible to trace it directly to the latter. This coinage, moreover, appears to have been the latest, being apparently of the time of Claudius or in part later; it may be supposed to have come to an end about the time when the Brigantes, whose sway extended over much of the country, from the Humber and Mersey so far perhaps as the Caledonian Forest, submitted to the Roman yoke soon after the year 69. In vain, however, do we scan the coins in question for any of the historical names of that people, such as Cartismandua, Venutios, or Vello-catus; in fact, there is no reason for supposing them to have belonged to the Brigantes so much as to a people inhabiting the districts now known as Holderness and the Yorkshire Wolds—possibly the whole coast from the Humber to the Tees. In Ptolemy's Geography, a great work published about the year 120, they are called Parisi, which makes it probable that they were a branch of the Parisii on the Seine, who have left their name to the city of Paris. Their town, called Petuaria, appears to have been at Hedon, close to where Kingston-upon-Hull now stands, and he places them around what he calls the Fair-havened Bay, referring probably to the once important harbour of Hornsea. We find other towns of theirs besides Petuaria in the Delgovicia of the ancients, which was probably Market Weighton, and in Derventio, somewhere on the Derwent, probably Kexby or Elvington. Some of the barrows of this people, containing the remains of war-chariots and other things of the Iron Age, also connect them with Market Weighton, Beverley, Pocklington, and other localities in the East Riding. But when did the Parisi arrive in this country? was it before the Brigantes, so that the latter had to land on the coast north of this district? or did they come after the Brigantes, and succeed in seizing a corner of their territory by main force? and, if so, how late did they make their appearance in the Humber? These are questions one has at present no means of answering; but it is clear that at the time in question the Parisi were sufficiently independent of their powerful neighbours to have had a coinage of their own. Some of the pieces extant are, moreover, interesting as giving the title granted to the person in whose name they were issued. Thus one Volisios styles himself sometimes Domnocoveros and sometimes Domnoveros, which may possibly have meant the guardian of the state, or the man of the people. At any rate it has been observed that the same term occurs on a coin of Dumnorix, the Æduan, whose great popularity¹ with the common people Cæsar dwells upon more than once. This, in fact, was one of the reasons why he was distrusted and ordered to be cut down when he refused to follow Cæsar on his second expedition to Britain. On another of these northern coins the person who issued it gives himself a title, which, if correctly read Senotigirnos, would literally mean the old lord or old monarch, whatever the exact official signification of that may have been among the Parisi. Unfortunately, the relation of these two kinds of coins to one another in point of time is not known; should they turn out to be of the same date, they might be taken to prove the state to have been divided into two parties, the one clinging to the representative of a dynasty, and the other rallying round one who gave himself out as the friend of the people. If we do not misunderstand their coins, the Parisi may briefly be said to have been in the condition of a people who were either struggling to cast away the kingly yoke, or who had succeeded in doing so, and were threatened with a tyranny of a different kind—that of the adventurer who seeks power by hoodwinking the crowd. A very doubtful exception is to be made as to the language being Gaulish, in the case of a group of coins with the letters VEP CORF, which are possibly to be treated as Latin, standing for VEP. COR.F., meaning “Vepotalos son of Correos,” or the like. In that case they might reasonably be regarded as the last native money coined in early Britain.

¹ "Bell. Gall.," vii. 32, 33.

¹ "Bell. Gall.," i. 3, 9, 18, 20.

Pomponius Mela, a Spanish writer of the first century, states that the further a British people was from the Continent, the less it knew of any other wealth than flocks and land; but some of them probably made use of ingots of bronze, of bars of iron, such as Cæsar alludes to, and also, perhaps, of rings or pellets of gold, as a medium of exchange. Nor did the coined money of the southern states fail to get admission to others far away from them. Thus there is an instance on record of one of the coins of the Dobunni being found so far north as Dumfries, while several have been discovered in Monmouthshire, that is to say, in the land of the Silures, who would seem to have been the people meant by Solinus, when he states that the inhabitants of what he calls the Island of Silura would have nothing to do with money¹ at a time not before the first century, but possibly a good deal later. A study of the early money of Britain also throws some light on the paths of intercourse between it and the Continent. The shortest of these, and probably the earliest in use for trade, was between Kent and the neighbouring coast of Gaul: it always continued, no doubt, to be the route along which the trade with the south-east of Britain was carried on. According to Pliny² quoting from Timæus, who wrote about the middle of the fourth century before our era, and got his information probably from Pytheas, Thanet may have been the island at high tide, to which the tin of the west was brought in coracles by the natives for sale to the merchants who came for it from Gaul. The coasting voyage seems to have taken the former six days to make. But there was another line of communication, the use of which was probably never discontinued from the time when Belgic tribes first settled in the island. The Belgæ advanced westwards into Gaul, being pressed forward

¹ "Solinus," edited by Mommsen, p. 114.

² "Hist. Nat.," iv. 16 (30).

probably by the Teutonic peoples in their rear. When they got familiar enough with the sea to cross the Channel, some of them continued the westward course of their race, and may be supposed to have landed in the harbours between Dungeness and the mouth of the Dorsetshire Stour. There is no evidence that either the Cantii on the one side, or the Durotriges and the peninsular tribes behind them on the other, should be considered Belgic. From the intervening line of coast they spread to the Thames and pressed westwards to the Severn Sea ; while the territory of those who retained the name of Belgæ in Britain lay between that of the Regni, the Atrebates and the Dobunni on the one hand, and the line on the other of the Dorsetshire Stour and the Mendip Hills, beyond which were the Durotriges and the Dumnonii. The early coins on the Belgic seaboard of Britain and Gaul are far from easy to distinguish, and they bear ample evidence to the truth of the tradition reported by Cæsar that Belgic tribes had made themselves a home in the south of the island. How far their line of communication became also the route for trade it is hard to say : possibly some of the tin of Cornwall was brought into their territory, and then conveyed to some place near the mouth of the Seine. There is also numismatic evidence of a connection between the British coast and the Channel Islands, whence it probably extended to the opposite coast of Gaul: the coins in question point to the time of Claudius, but the intercourse they indicate may have begun much earlier. No inscribed money seems to have been coined by the tribes west of the Belgæ, but it is possible that the Durotriges may have had an un-inscribed coinage ; and they seem to have had the coins of other tribes in circulation among them, both inscribed and uninscribed ones at the same time, so that they were in that respect somewhat more backward than the Ececi. Whether the Durotriges belonged to the earlier or to the later Celtic invasion is not quite certain, but on the whole they may be classified with their neighbours, the Dumnonii, the remains of whose language in Devon and Cornwall leave us in no kind of doubt that they were of the earlier Celts or Goidels, not of the Brythons. Nor is it improbable that, in point of civilization, they were behind the inhabitants of the south-east of the island, with the exception of the people of the tin districts, which in ancient times were chiefly Dartmoor, with the country around Tavistock, and that around St. Austell, including several valleys looking towards the southern coast of Cornwall. In most of the other districts where tin existed it is supposed to have lain too deep to have been worked in early times. In the Scilly Isles, which have been sometimes erroneously identified with the Cassiterides of ancient authors, neither is tin worked now, nor are the old workings there either numerous or deep. The information which we have about this part of the country is scanty : some uninscribed coins which were current among the Durotriges and on the Belgic coast of Britain have been found in Cornwall, which would again suggest a trade in tin along the southern coast in the direction of Thanet. Then we come to a contemporary of Cicero's, the Greek geographer Posidonius, to whom we have already alluded as having extended his travels to Cornwall, which he called Belerion, a name given afterwards by Ptolemy to the Land's End: his account of the countries he saw has been preserved to us by Diodorus, who wrote a little later. That author tells¹ us, among other things, that the inhabitants of that promontory of Britain called Belerion, were very fond of strangers, and that from their intercourse with foreign merchants they were civilized in their manner of life. According to him, they prepared the tin by working very skilfully the earth in which it was found: the ground was rocky, but it contained earthy veins, the produce of which was ground down, smelted, and purified. The metal, we are further told, was made into slabs of the form of knuckle-bones, and carried to a certain island lying off the coast of Britain, called Ictis. During the ebb of the tide the intervening space was left dry, and to that place they carried over abundance of tin in their waggons. And, after a few words about such islands at high water, he goes on to say, that in one of them the merchants bought the tin from the natives and carried it over to Gaul; and that, after travelling overland for about thirty days, they finally brought their loads on pack-horses to the outlet of the Rhone, that is to say, to the meeting of the Rhone and the Sâone, where the wharfs for the tin-barges were erected. Diodorus further states,¹ after mentioning the tin brought from the Cassiterides, that much was also carried across from Britain to the opposite shore of Gaul, and was thence brought on horseback through the midst of the Celtic country to Marseilles, and also to the city of Narbonne. All this refers to the tin of the Dumnonian peninsula, and shows that quantities of it were then carried to an island lying to the east, whence the passage to Gaul was short. It has been argued that the island itself can hardly have been St. Michael's Mount, as some suppose, since that, it is said, does not seem to have been an island at all in old times; nor was it the Isle of Wight, for that was never accessible on foot, while some authors are strongly of opinion that it was no other than Thanet,² which must formerly have corresponded completely to the description already cited. This view would explain Cæsar's singular statement that British tin came from the inland parts of the country;³ but the question of the transit is too difficult for us to settle. In earlier times the tin seems to have been brought from the west in boats, if one may trust the somewhat obscure account given by Timæus. So one might infer that between his time and that of Posidonius and Cæsar some considerable improvement had been made in the matter of roads in the south of Britain.

¹ See "Bibl. Hist.," v. 22, and Elton, p. 36.

¹ See "Bibl. Hist.," v. 38.

² See this question discussed in Elton's book, i. pp. 34, &c.

³ "Bell. Gall.," v. 12.

Was there, then, any trade in tin carried on directly between Cornwall and the Continent, continued from the time of the Carthaginians or Phœnicians? There is not a scrap of evidence, linguistic or other, of the presence of Phœnicians in Britain at any time, and the supposed proof (in the writings of Festus Avienus, a somewhat confused poet of the fourth century) that Himilco, in the flourishing times of Carthage, carried his voyage of discovery as far as this country, is exceedingly unsatisfactory. Had there ever been Carthaginian commerce with the tin districts of west Britain, it would probably have been continued by the Veneti, in whose hands the trade with this country was in Cæsar's time. These last traded in tin, which they landed at the mouths of the Garonne and the Loire, whence it was carried across to Marseilles and Narbonne; and at one time they probably landed British tin at the mouth of the latter river, but they had to fetch it most likely from the south-east of Britain. If there was any direct trade in tin between the tin districts of Britain and the Loire, it must have been utterly unknown to Cæsar, which is not likely to have been the case had it existed. Besides, the fact that the Dumnonii neither had a coinage of their own, nor appear to have made much use of money at all, strongly suggests the inference that they lived practically much further from the commerce of the south of Europe than did the British peoples to the east of them: however fond they may have been of strangers, they would seem to have bartered their tin mainly for the trinkets of the Mediterranean and other such ornamental rubbish as a barbarous people is wont to delight in. But this must not be understood to prove that there was no communication between the Dumnonii and the nearest part of Gaul during the Venetic period: in fact, Dumnonia was probably the part of Britain in which the Gaulish students of druidism mentioned by Cæsar usually landed: possibly, however, this communication is not to be regarded as being then of very old standing. The Carthaginians had extended their trade in tin from Spain to Gaul, and some stream-works of the Bronze Age are known to have been carried out in certain localities, among others, in the Morbihan¹ or the country of the Veneti. It is to this contact with the Carthaginians we are, no doubt, to trace the beginning of the naval power of the Veneti, who, at the end of the second Punic War and the downfall of the Carthaginian power in Spain, succeeded so completely to their trade in tin, that there is no record of any interruption in the supply to the markets of the Mediterranean. They landed the metal at the mouth of the Loire and of the Garonne, some of which they brought from the Cassiterides or tin-islands in Vigo Bay, on the coast of Spain. The trade with the latter had been kept in such mystery that no Roman could find out anything respecting it until Publius Crassus,² one of Cæsar's lieutenants, succeeded in personally ascertaining all about it, after the conquest of the Veneti and of Aquitania had been effected. Had they been in the habit of carrying the tin of Britain directly from where it was found to the mouth of the Loire, it is probable that Cæsar, or some one of those who acted under his command, would have got wind of it. Cæsar's account¹ of the marine of the Veneti shows that it had made a deep impression on his mind: their ships, he says, were of a large size, and stood so high out of the water that the Romans could not well attack them with their missiles, and even when they raised turrets on their galleys they were not so high as the poops of the Venetian ships. They were made of solid oak, with decks a foot thick, fastened with bolts of iron as thick as a man's thumb, while the metal used in making the ships in which Cæsar passed into Britain is mentioned as being bronze. The former vessels had sails of hides, and their anchors were fastened by means of iron chains instead of ropes, while the beaks of the Roman galleys could do their hulls no harm. When, however, they had to manœuvre within a small area, they had the worst of it as soon as the Romans bethought themselves of sharp hooks with long handles to cut their ropes and render the sails, on which they depended, useless. Up to their unsuccessful contest with Cæsar in 56, the Veneti not only carried on most of the trade with Britain, or levied a tax on all others who took part in it, but they counted among their allies all the maritime tribes from the Loire to the country of the Morini and Menapii, and they obtained help also from Britain, whence it may be gathered, as they mainly relied on what they could do at sea, that the ships of all the members of this Armoric or maritime league, were much of the same make, whether in Gaul or in Britain; and some idea of their number may be formed from the fact that the Veneti managed to get together on their own coast south of Brittany about 220 vessels fully manned to oppose Cæsar's fleet, as soon as it sailed out of the Loire. They were, as already suggested, not fitted for war, but for trading on a sea which Cæsar ever and anon dwells upon as vast and exposed, where the difficulty of navigation seemed to him, who never knew exactly what to make of the ebb and flow of the tide, to be extreme, and where the harbours were few and far between, or hardly existed at all; in other words, he seems to have regarded their vessels as eminently qualified for long voyages. But how far those ancient sailors of the Armoric league, who had not the mariner's compass, ventured out on the open sea where they had no coast-line to guide them, we have no means of ascertaining, but, as a rule, they may be supposed to have hugged the shore. The most important elements in the Veneti's trade with Britain in Cæsar's time were, as already mentioned, the exportation of tin and the importation of bronze, together, doubtless, with a variety of articles to be worn as ornaments and amulets. But, when Strabo wrote some seventy or more years later, the imports included the following things, in the order he gives them:—pottery, salt, and articles of brass or, more correctly speaking, bronze ; and then he groups contemptuously together ivory rings, necklaces, red amber, glass-ware, and such like trumpery. But still more interesting is Strabo's account of the things produced in the island, namely, corn, cattle, gold, silver, and iron : these, he writes, were all exported to the Continent, together with skins, slaves, and dogs fitted for the chase and for war as carried on by the Gauls. The exportation of corn and cattle would seem to imply that the country had enjoyed a period of considerable prosperity after Cæsar's departure, and the mention of gold and silver is interesting, but not so much so as the fact that by this time iron, which was very scarce when Cæsar was here, was now found in sufficient quantities to become an article of export. Where the slaves chiefly came from is not indicated, but it was probably from the more remote parts of the island, and possibly also from Ireland ; a still more important question about them must likewise be left unanswered, and that is whether they were wholly or mostly captives taken in war.

¹ Boyd Dawkins's "Early Man in Britain," p. 403.

² Strabo, 5, 11 (C. 176).

¹ "Bell. Gall.," iii. 13.

But, by way of summarizing these remarks, one may say that there is no reason to think that the conquest of the Veneti and the Armoric league by Cæsar caused the art of ship-building, such as they had learnt it from the Carthaginians of Spain, to be lost on the shores of Gaul and Britain ; indeed, his breaking down their monopoly may have had quite the contrary effect, and it is not improbable that the ships of the Veneti became the pattern for all vessels used afterwards by the Romans in British waters, so that our marine of the present day may be regarded as, in a manner, deriving its descent through the shipping of the Veneti from that of the Carthaginians and the proud merchants of Tyre and Sidon. In other respects, the connection with the Roman world into which Cæsar brought Britain gave a powerful impetus to the trade between them, and opened a door for the Roman influence evidenced here by the way some of the coins, to which attention has been called, were got up, as well as by the beginning, to which they testify, of the use of Latin as the official language of this country. Looking, then, at its inhabitants from this point of view, and as they were before the Claudian invasion, we may say that those of the south-east were the most civilized, and that some of those of Brythonic or Gaulish descent, occupying the tract from the Severn Sea to the Isle of Thanet, and from the Channel to the Tees, had progressed so far as to have money of their own coining. Of the Goidelic branch, it appears that the Durotriges may have had a letterless coinage, that the Dumnonii, without actually excluding coins from their country, showed probably a marked preference for the nick-nacks of Mediterranean workshops, while barter was the only way of doing business understood by the Silures and the other Goidelic tribes of the remoter parts of the island.

Let us now leave the coins and commerce of the early Britons, to take a somewhat more comprehensive view of their habits. Cæsar, who penetrated north of the Thames, had ample opportunities of observing the appearance of the country, and of learning much about the inhabitants, but there is no reason to suppose that he saw any representatives of the older Celtic settlers, or of the non-Celtic aborigines, excepting possibly as slaves. He considered the country very thickly inhabited, and the abundance of cattle to be deserving of notice. The buildings he saw resembled those of Gaul, and were very numerous, but according to him the British idea of a town or fortress was a place with a tangled wood round it, and fortified with a rampart and ditch; inside this they would, as Strabo tells us, build their huts and collect their cattle, but not with a view of remaining there long. Cæsar regarded the people of Kent, whom he thought by far the most civilized, as only slightly differing from those of Gaul; and Diodorus draws a contrast between the simple and frugal habits of the Britons and the luxurious way of living, consequent on riches, with which he was familiar. The thickness of the population in the south-east, and the habit of harvesting the corn in spacious barns, would naturally lead one to suppose that it was largely and successfully grown there even then; but the population was probably more sparse and corn less extensively grown in the districts where the ears reaped were stowed away in holes underground until wanted to meet the needs of the day; and when Cæsar goes on to say, that most of those in the interior sowed no corn, but lived on flesh and milk, and wore skins for their clothing, we have, doubtless, to do with statements which were in the main true, though one has no means of fixing to a nicety on the tribes to which they applied. But, in making them, he had probably nothing to go upon but the vague hearsay reports, which may have been current among the more civilized people of the south-eastern part of the island, with regard to the backward state of some of the inhabitants of the remoter regions of the west and the north. The same remark applies to Strabo, when he states that some knew nothing about gardening and other things relating to the farmer's life; but when he mentions that, with abundance of milk at their disposal, there were some who were too ignorant to make cheese, his statement is at least illustrated by the negative evidence of the Welsh word for cheese, caws, which, like its English equivalent, is nothing but the Latin caseus borrowed. It is somewhat otherwise when Cæsar says that all the Britons painted themselves with woad: one could hardly have expected this to have been in vogue among the inhabitants of the south-east; but he wrote probably from the evidence of his own eyes, so it must be accepted as true even of them. After all, it may have meant no more than painting the face for battle or certain religious rites, a habit not to be confounded with the much more serious one of tattooing, which prevailed in parts of the north of the island down to a comparatively late period. The poet Ovid, of a later date, sings of the painted Britons. The custom may be regarded as one which once prevailed very widely. Some authors allude to the Agathyrsi and Geloni as practising it, others in like manner to Sarmatians and Dacians, and Herodotus to the Thracians, while Sidonius, Bishop of Clermont in the fifth century, graphically describes how some Saxons he had seen daubed their faces with blue paint, and pushed their hair back to the crown, to make the forehead look larger.¹ Cæsar further tells us that the Britons shaved all except the upper lip; and the hair of the head was allowed to grow long. ~~But~~ no statement of his has attracted more attention than what he says about the morals of the people, to the effect that ten or twelve men living together, and consisting especially of brothers, or of a father and his sons, would have their wives in common, the children being reckoned those of the man to whom the maid was first given in marriage in each case. So far from this having been the custom of the Celts of Britain, it is not certain that it can have been to any great extent that of any Aryan people whatsoever. If one could be sure that this singular statement was not a passage from some Greek book of imaginary travels among imaginary barbarians, which Cæsar had in his mind, it would be possible to point out the facts to which it bore a kind of relation. In the first place, one might suppose that he had heard and misunderstood some description of the families of the Britons to the effect, that it was usual for ten or twelve men, with their wives and children, to live together under the patria potestas or power of one father and head, a kind of undivided family well known to the student of early institutions, and marking a particular stage in the social development of most Aryan nations. And in the next place it is probable that the Britons of the south-east of the island, and some of the Gauls of the Continent, were acquainted with a report that there were tribes in the remoter parts of Britain, whose view of matrimony was not the one usual among Aryan nations. A statement, similar to that made by Cæsar, is mentioned and doubted by Strabo,¹ but by his time this manner of living had to be sought in Ireland, and Dion Cassius,² who wrote at the beginning of the third century, repeats it of the people of Scotland. Later still, it entered into the picture drawn, but in a far less hideous form, of the pauper king of the Hebrides, by the interpolators of Solinus,³ and it is repeated of the grass-eating community of Thule, where it might have been appropriately allowed to drop, but that St. Jerome and others thought they had reasons to associate it with the name of the Scotti and the Atecotti, which suggests that both Britain and Ireland contained down to a comparatively late date non-Celtic peoples, who were not altogether Celtic or Aryan in their family arrangements.¹

¹ See his letter to Lampridius in the 8th book of his "Epistles."

¹ Strabo, 5, 4 (C. 201).

² See his Roman History (abridged by Xiphilinus), book lxxvi. 12; also lxxvi. 16, for Argentocoxos' wife's well-known reply to Julia Augusta, when she found fault with British morals.

³ Mommsen's Edition, pp. 234-5.

The political condition of the people of Brythonic Britain towards the end of the early Iron Age and the close of their independence, is best studied in connection with that of Gaul as described by Cæsar. The Celts, like all other Aryan nations, were once under the rule of kings resembling those of early Rome, or those of Greece in the Heroic Age, as depicted in Homer's Iliad. But this kind of personal rule came to an end among various Aryan peoples at different times, owing to the action of the chiefs subordinate to the king seizing his power and making it temporary and elective in their own class. This step led the same man to govern and obey in turns, and thereby formed, no doubt, a very distinct step in advance. In this way the kings had been superseded in the 7th century before our era, throughout nearly the whole of Greece and the Greek Colonies; and in every instance it was an oligarchy or the rule of a class that rose on the ruins of the kingly power; so also at Rome when the Tarquins were driven out, practically all power was seized by the patricians. A similar revolution, though no Gaulish Herodotus or Livy was found to commit it to the pages of history, had taken place in Gaul before Cæsar came there; but not very long before, since he appears to have found almost everywhere the sulking and plotting representatives of the fallen dynasties, ¹ See also Stokes's note in the "Revue Celtique," v. p. 232.

and to have readily turned them to use, either in bringing him information about what was going on in the senates of the peoples who had expelled their ancestors from the office of king, or in keeping their states in subjection by appointing them kings in the room of their fathers and under Roman protection.¹ This was notoriously the policy of Rome at all times, and it was exceedingly distasteful to the people of Gaul, for their detestation of kings was, perhaps, not a whit less intense than that of the Romans themselves; thus we find² that the intriguing Æduan, Dumnorix, knew of no readier way of filling the Æduan senate with hatred for Cæsar, than by quietly suggesting to them that he had been given the office of king over them. The punishment fixed by law among the Helvetii for trying to secure supreme power was that of being burnt alive, and to escape it Orgetorix was believed to have committed suicide before his trial came on.³ But, though the oligarchical form of government was an advance on the old monarchy, it could not, as a rule, last long, for the very important reason, that it was wont to do nothing for the bulk of the people. At Rome, the difficulty was solved in a peculiar way, by unwilling concessions on the part of the patricians, but in Greece the immediate outcome was a plentiful crop of despots, who prevailed for a time. The same thing had begun to take place in Gaul, although it had been foreseen, probably, in every state, and stringently legislated against. The Ædui,¹ for instance, had enacted that neither of the chief magistrates, elected to discharge the office of a king for the space of a year, could be of the same family as one who had previously held the office, in case of the latter being still alive: they could not even be members of the senate at the same time. We said neither of them, because Cæsar's narrative, supported by the evidence of Gaulish coins, proves that the Ædui had not one chief magistrate whose office they called vergobretos or the administrator of justice, but two,² whose position may be supposed to have been analogous to that of the consuls at Rome. This dual office, which does not seem to have been confined to the Ædui, survived as the duumvirate for administering the law in the cities of conquered Gaul, and helped the Gauls, doubtless, to accommodate themselves to the municipal customs of Rome. But the common people in Cæsar's time continued individually to occupy a position which appeared to him to have been hardly better than that of slaves, and in order to protect themselves against the tyranny of the more powerful members of the community they had to become the clients of some influential nobleman, and to add themselves to the number of those who were tied to him hand and foot by the bonds of debt. The condition of these men reminds one of that of the bankrupt plebeians of Rome before the secession to the Mons Sacer, and in both cases it was probably one of the results of the subjugation of a non-Aryan population by Aryan invaders. The great man, however, lost his influence over his clients the moment he failed to protect them. This being so, one is prepared for Cæsar's further statement that every state was torn asunder by factions. Some of the leaders succeeded in making themselves masters of their states, and the designs of a good many more were cut short by the advance of Roman arms. The despots, as we may call them, for the sake of distinguishing them from the old kings, appear to have belonged to somewhat different stages of political development, the lowest being those who adopted the simple plan of hiring troops¹ to overpower the senate of the oligarchy; but there were others who were more wary and showed more outward regard for law: these thought it needful to enlist the populace on their side, which they proceeded to do by eloquence and bribes. In fact, there is every reason to suppose that the common people were collectively beginning to acquire influence, and already, here and there, to understand their own power, though they had not as yet taken the initiative. But their temper was the first thing to be considered by any adventurous nobleman who desired his own advancement ; and Ambiorix, one of the most powerful Gaulish leaders at the head of a formidable alliance opposed to Cæsar, once excused himself by saying that the multitude had no less power over him than he had over them.¹ Without trying to define the capacity of the ancient Gauls for political development, we may say that they are seen only as it were for a moment, in one of the most critical periods in a nation's history. Indeed the flippant generalities formulated about them, from the days of Cæsar to our own, seldom do them more justice than if the independence of Greece had closed with the rise of the tyrants, and we based our estimate of the Greek character on the little that happens to be known of the struggles between the tyrants and the oligarchies. Nor is it quite an accident that the nation descended mainly from the Gauls forms at the present moment a great and prosperous community, consisting neither of the grumbling tenantry of an aristocracy nor of the unwillingly drilled liverymen of a Cæsarism.

¹ See, among other passages in point, "Bell. Gall.," i. 3; iv. 12; v. 25, 54.

² Ib., v. 6.

³ Ib., i. 4.

¹ "Bell. Gall.," vii. 33.

² Cæsar's words occur at i. 16, and read in the manuscripts: "Diuiçiacio et Lisco qui summo magistratui præerant quem uergobretum appellant Ædui." The editors, however, always print præerat, as they find a difficulty, probably, in reconciling this passage with Cæsar's account of the quarrel mentioned by him in vii. 32, 33, where he must, we think, be supposed to have been speaking of the election to only one of the two offices—possibly the two were not filled at the same time of the year. The question is one recently and admirably started by M. Mowat in the "Revue Celtique," v. pp. 121-4.

¹ "Bell. Gall.," ii. 1.

The state of things, politically speaking, which existed in Gaul, existed also most likely among the Belgic tribes in Britain, when Commios (supposing the Atrebat of that name to have been the same man as the Commios of the British coins) was enabled to procure sovereignty for himself in the island and to transmit it to his sons. So much may also be gathered from the excuse, which the ambassadors, who came to ask Cæsar for peace soon after his first landing in Britain, made for having put Commios in bonds, namely, that it was the act of the multitude that knew no better. Now, whether it was the real cause or not, it is clear that it was a possible cause, which might be pleaded by those among whom Commios had landed, but not with any show of dignity, if we suppose them to have been under the rule of a king of the old type, who brooked no meddling on the part of the common people. Here we have apparently to do with a people to the east of the Belgic tribes, namely, the inhabitants of Cantion or Kent, among whom Commios and the ambassadors returning from Gaul had probably landed. These according to Cæsar's account of his second expedition had no less than four kings acting in obedience to Cassivelaunos as commander of the organization against the Romans: the probability is that not one of the four in a country so near Gaul was a king of the old description. The same conclusion is likewise indicated by the coins of the Parisi, which have already been alluded to, and by those of the Catti, which seem to show only the name of the state, as do also some of those of the Eцени. But as the most advanced people of Britain were old-fashioned enough to paint themselves and to rely so much in war on their chariots, it is not surprising to find that kings, and those probably of the old sort, were not extinct by any means among them. One of the most powerful states was that of the Catuvelauni, who may have been too much occupied in war with their neighbours to have paid as much attention to the form of government under which they lived as they might otherwise have done. The Trinovantes also had been living under kings, until the last of them before Cæsar's raids had been slain by Cassivelaunos. The remaining Brythonic peoples of Britain have left the historian no means of making out anything definite about their form of government so far as we know; but it is not improbable that the kings and queens of the Brigantes were of the old description.

¹ "Bell. Gall.," v. 27.

As to the earlier Celtic inhabitants of the island we have no evidence that any of them had got beyond the rule of kings of the older kind. The series of the old kingships may be supposed to have been completely interrupted or profoundly modified in Britain by the Roman occupation; consequently little is to be learned as to their nature from that of the kingships which rose after the Roman legions left for good. The earlier ones, however, may be presumed to have been most likely of the same type as those of Ireland, where the series were never broken by Roman rule. As among the Greeks the king of the ancient Irish legends may be said to have reigned by divine right and by divine favour, so he must not be disfigured by any blemish¹ or have lost a limb. The mythical Irish King (in reality the Celtic sea-god) Nuada, said to have had his hand cut off in battle, was, we are told, compelled to resign

¹ See the "Senchus Mór," i. 73.

See after page 96.

CELTIC BRITAIN.

his office until a western Æsculapius provided him with a wonderful hand of silver with motion in every finger. Moreover, as the man who criticized the kings before Troy was found to be the ugly Thersites, so the usurper of the power of the rightful king in Irish legend is sometimes described as a cat-headed monster with the displeasure of Heaven attending on his footsteps; for the land in his time yields no corn, the trees no fruit, the rivers no fish, the cows no milk. When, however, the rightful king, that is to say, the king of the right stock, recovers his power, the seasons become tranquil, the cows give milk in abundance, the earth is fruitful, the rivers teem with fish, and the trees bend heavy-laden under their crop of fruit.¹ The Goidels of Britain entertained the same opinion; for we catch a glimpse of it among the descendants of the ancient Silures as late as the 12th century in the belief recorded by Giraldus, that the birds of the Lake of Savaddon, near Brecon, would all begin to sing at the bidding of the rightful prince of Wales: the story relates how Griffith son of Rhys got them to warble and to beat the water with their wings for sheer loyalty after refusing to obey the Norman barons, who were then masters both of Griffith's person and of his land.² A king of the old sort was responsible to nobody, but he ¹ See "The Four Masters' Annals of the Kingdom of Ireland," A.M. 3303, 3310, 3311; A.D. 14, 15, 76; also the "Senchus Mór," iii. 24, 25.

² Giraldus's "Itinerarium Kambriæ," I. ii. (p. 34 of the Rolls Edition).

See at
page

towards Ireland, in the territory of a people called, according to the best conjecture, the Decangi¹, who may have inhabited Cheshire, or more probably the part of North Wales between the Dee and the Clwyd. The Decangi did not face the legions in the open field, but they harassed their plundering parties, and were at length rid of them, for news of discord among the Brigantes induced the general to lead his men away in that direction. The relation in which the Brigantes stood to the Romans at this time is a matter of uncertainty, but they were possibly a kind of allies. With a view both to overawe the conquered tribes in the east of the island, and to have a reserve to fall back upon, Ostorius established a strong colony of veterans at Camulodunon.

The Silures now come to the foreground as a people whom neither severity nor clemency could induce to put up with Roman rule. They occupied the eastern half of the country between the lower course of the Severn and Cardigan Bay, the rest of that tract being the land of the Demetæ. The middle of Wales, north of these peoples, was occupied by the powerful state of the Ordovices, who probably belonged to the later Celtic settlers or Brythons, while the Silures and Demetæ were undoubtedly of the earlier Celts, and also represented by assimilation and absorption whatever non-Celtic tribes had managed to remain in that part of the country. The

¹ Tacitus, "Ann.," xii. 32.

Silures were less civilized than the Brythons to the east of them, but they were also more intrepid and indomitable ; their territory probably bordered on a portion of the country which had been under the rule of Cunobelinos's son, Caratacos ; so we find him, after resisting the Roman arms for nearly nine years with various results, which gave him pre-eminence over all other native leaders, actively engaged among the Silures, to whom he may be supposed to have brought superior skill in the operations of war, and in whom he found braver warriors than in his own land. The sequel is so well known that we need not give Tacitus' account¹ in detail, as to how he led his forces into the country of the Ordovices, how he chose an advantageous position and fought bravely but unsuccessfully against Ostorius, how he escaped to the Brigantes, and was given up to the Romans by their queen, Cartismandua, and how his manly bearing struck the Romans and obtained for him and his family the emperor's pardon, guilty as he was of the crime of fighting for his own. But while the idlers of Rome crowded to behold the man who had defied the legions for so many years, and the senators compared Ostorius's victory to the most remarkable successes of Roman generals in previous ages, Ostorius found that he had by no means done with the Silures ; for we read of them very soon afterwards inflicting severe losses on the forces left in their country. So persistent did they prove in their opposition to Roman rule, that there was a talk for a time that they were all to be cut off ; but in the meanwhile Ostorius died, and his enemies boasted, that, though he was not slain in battle, still it was the worry of the war that killed him. His successor, Aulus Didius, personally took no very active part in the operations ; but he had to deal not only with the Silures, but also with the Brigantes, whose king, Venutios, was the most able native leader since Caratacos had been taken. The former had been faithful to the Romans for some time, but a disagreement with the queen, Cartismandua, who was his wife¹ but preferred his armour-bearer, brought him into collision with the Romans, who interfered successfully to save the queen from Venutios ; nevertheless their victory led to nothing further. Didius was followed in command by Veranius in 57, but he died the next year without having effected anything except ravaging the land of the Silures.

¹ Tacitus, "Ann.," xii. 33-7.

Nothing had been done since Ostorius's death to extend the Roman conquests, but Suetonius Paulinus, whom Nero sent here in 58, led the legions into Mona or Anglesey, which is described as being a receptacle for fugitives. He ordered flat-bottomed boats to be got ready, in which the foot soldiers were carried across the Menai, and the following is the account which Tacitus² gives of the scene:—"On the shore stood the forces of the enemy, a dense array of arms and men, with women dashing through the ranks like the furies ; their dress was funereal, their hair dishevelled, and they carried torches in their hands. The druids around the host, pouring forth dire imprecations, with their hands uplifted towards the heavens, struck terror into the soldiers by the strangeness of the sight ; insomuch that, as if their limbs were paralysed, they exposed their bodies to the weapons of the enemy without attempting to move. Afterwards, at the earnest exhortations of the general, and from the effect of their own mutual importunities that they would not be scared by a rabble of women and fanatics, they bore down upon them, smote all that opposed them to the earth, and wrapped them in the flames they had themselves kindled. A garrison was then established to overawe the vanquished, and the groves dedicated to sanguinary superstitions destroyed ; for they deemed it a duty to their deities to cover their altars with the blood of captives, and to seek the will of the gods in the entrails of men."

¹ "Ann.," xii. 36, 40; "Hist.," iii. 45.

² "Ann.," xiv. 29, 30.

While Suetonius was thus occupied in Mona,¹ news reached him that the rest of the province, left denuded of troops, was in revolt. It was headed by Boudicca, the widow-queen of the Eцени, whose husband, Prasutagos, had probably been set over that people after their unsuccessful rebellion some eight years previously. Prasutagos, who was known for his opulence, had thought it prudent for the safety of his family to make the emperor joint heir with his own daughters to his wealth. The Roman officials, however, regarded this as an excuse to treat his goods as the spoils of war : the queen was flogged, her daughters were ravished, and the chief Ecenians were treated as slaves. Boudicca, who would not quietly suffer, organized a revolt, which was joined by other tribes, and especially by the Trinovantes, who were robbed of their land by the colony established at Camulodunon. The result is well known : some 70,000 Romans were killed by the enraged Britons, and Suetonius is supposed to have retaliated by killing 80,000 of the natives, when he returned.

¹ "Annals," xiv. 30, &c.

There is not much to record about Britain till Vespasian, who was well acquainted with it, seized on the Roman empire in the year 69 ; he successively sent here at least three great generals, the first being Petilius Cerealis, who effected the reduction of the Brigantes in the years 69 and 70 : they were reputed, Tacitus¹ tells us, to have formed the most populous state in the island (or the province, as the Romans were now in the habit of calling it), and their subjection was brought about only after many battles had been fought, some of which were attended with great bloodshed. His successor was Julius Frontinus, who undertook the task of subduing the Silures : this, in spite of the bravery of that people, and the difficult nature of their country, he accomplished not long probably before the advent in 78 of Vespasian's third great general, Julius

¹ "Agricola," ch. 17, &c.

Agricola. It is, however, very remarkable that this people should have been able to resist the Roman arms with more or less success for so many years, and it may be regarded as certain that a very considerable force was left to occupy their country; for afterwards the second Augustan legion is found permanently posted at Isca Silurum, called later Caerleon (or the Camp of the Legion) on the Usk, a little above the present town of Newport, a site well known on account of its Roman remains, and among them a goodly number of inscriptions. It was the middle of the summer of 78 when Agricola arrived, and the soldiers were already thinking of their winter quarters, although a considerable body of Roman cavalry had not long before been cut off by the Ordovices, on whose frontiers they were stationed, and a great many of the natives were halting between peace and war. But Agricola quickly set out into the territory of the Ordovices, and inflicted on them such losses in this short war, that according to Tacitus¹ it resulted almost in the total extirpation of that people; but the statement is proved to have been an exaggeration, both by their subsequent history and the extent of the wild country they occupied. This included the district north of the Silures and the Demetæ, a portion of the adjacent counties of England, together with North Wales except, roughly speaking, the north-west corner within the basins of the Clwyd and the Mawddach, which, with Mona, still belonged, it may be supposed, to the earlier Celtic settlers of the Goidelic branch, for there are reasons to think that the Ordovices who had thus reached the sea on the west formed the vanguard of the later Celtic invasion. But, as regards the Romans, the Ordovices and the Goidels in their rear usually acted together against them, and when the legions attacked the Ordovices they seem to have considered Mona their goal, and so that time. For Agricola, after crushing the Ordovices, pushed on until he came to the shore of the Menai; but the islanders, seeing that he had no vessels, thought they were safe. They were, however, soon convinced of their mistake; for the auxiliary troops, who were probably Gauls or natives of the low country near the mouth of the Rhine, suddenly plunged into the channel and safely swam across. The surrender of the island followed, and Agricola turned his attention to suppressing the abuses which made Roman rule so unbearable to the Britons, a policy attended with such success that the natives began to adopt Roman habits and customs and eventually set themselves to learn Latin.

¹ "Agricola," ch. 18, &c.

The army had been employed in the summer of 79 in harassing the natives who still held out, and it was not till the summer of the year 80 that Agricola undertook to extend the province towards the north. The lands of some of the Brigantian tribes were then overrun and fortresses erected in their midst, where the Roman troops, having been provided with a year's provisions, passed the winter. That, or the year after, was probably the time when a legion was first settled at Eburacou, or York.¹ Agricola's fourth summer in command, that of 81, was spent in securing the possession of these northern acquisitions, which were now to be bounded by the Forth and the Clyde, the neck of land between the estuaries of those rivers being defended by a chain of forts. In his fifth campaign Agricola directed his attention to the districts opposite Ireland, whereby Galloway was possibly meant. This he did, not because he had any fear from that quarter, but because he had a wish to conquer Ireland, for which a single legion with a few auxiliaries would have, he thought, sufficed. With that view he kept in readiness an Irish king who had been obliged to flee his own country. His sixth campaign, the year following, was directed against the tribes beyond the Forth, and the fleet sent out to explore the harbours of the north, acting in concert with the army, is said to have struck fear into the northern populations, that they should now be cut off from the last refuge of the vanquished, the secret retreats of their seas. This was learned from captives and it shows that even then the natives of the north knew how to turn their numerous lóchs and creeks to use. They gathered courage enough to act on the offensive, but in the general engagement which ensued they were worsted, and the Roman soldiers now wanted to advance into the heart of the country which Tacitus calls Caledonia. The Caledonians, however, far from being cowed, determined, by sinking their mutual jealousies, to oppose a united front to the invader the summer following—that is, in 85. Agricola sent his fleet to create fear and alarm along the coast, and marched his army so far as the Tay, at the meeting of which with the Isla, he is supposed to have found the Caledonians encamped to the number of 30,000 men. Their leader was one Calgacos, whom Tacitus describes as haranguing his countrymen in the most eloquent terms: Agricola is made to do the same with the legions, and then a terrible battle began, in which the historian asserts that the Caledonians lost one-third of their number. Among other things, he tells us that the natives were provided with short targets and long, pointless swords, which were useless in the thick of the fight, and that the chariots helped to increase the confusion into which they fell. This battle is known as that of Mons Granpius or Graupius; and when it had been won Agricola led his troops into the country of the Boresti, situated somewhere between the Tay and the Forth. He took hostages from the Boresti, and proceeded to winter quarters, probably south of the estuaries of the Forth and the Clyde, while the fleet was ordered to coast round the north of the island, which it did after passing the winter at a port which Tacitus terms Trucculensis or Trutulensis.¹ The Caledonians were molested no further, for the Roman general was now recalled by Domitian, who had been emperor since 81, and was getting jealous of Agricola's reputation.

¹ See Hübner, "Hermes," xvi. p. 543.

¹ "Agricola," ch. 38.

Under Agricola's successor the northern part of the province became independent again, and when Hadrian came here, in the year 120, to quell an incipient insurrection, he thought it best to draw a line from the Solway Firth to the mouth of the Tyne, and to defend it with a ditch, a stone wall, and an earthen rampart, together with castles and watch-towers. Antoninus, who succeeded Hadrian, found it necessary to send here Lollius Urbicus in the year 139 to subdue the Brigantes between Hadrian's Wall and the Firth of Forth: he then restored to the province the boundary fixed by Agricola, and made an earthen rampart between the Forth and the Clyde. Most of the country of the Brigantes and kindred tribes had now been brought under Roman rule, but not the whole; for there were peoples of this group beyond the two great rivers, though they usually appear under other names, leaving that of Brigantes to be identified chiefly with their kinsmen between the Forth and the Tees, where in a later age they yielded to an Anglian kingdom its name of Bernicia. Our authority on this war is Pausanias,¹ a Greek author who flourished about this time, but his words have seldom been fully understood. He states that the Romans attacked the Brigantes because they had invaded a people tributary to Rome, and called by him ἡ Γενουρία μοῖρα, the Genunian Division or Cohort. This word Genunia seems to betray itself as of Pictish origin, and of the same class as the name of a people of the Western Highlands opposite Skye, termed by a writer of the 7th century Geona Cohors,¹ or the Geonian Cohort. Such a singular use of μοῖρα and cohors is only to be explained by the Goidelic word it was meant to render, and the latter can have been no other than dál, a division or part, which was frequently used in forming ethnic names, like Dál-Riada, Dál-Cairbre, and Dál-Cais. The Genunians, then, cannot have been Brythons, and, if that be correct, they can hardly have been any other people than the dwellers between the Solway Esk and Loch Ryan. They would, in fact, seem to be the same people who appear later as Atecotti,² and later still as the Picts of Galloway. They were a highly indomitable race, and seldom on good terms with their Brythonic neighbours; so it is by no means probable that they had as yet fought it out with the Romans. Their tributary condition, which may have lasted until the time when the Atecotti appear among the fiercest enemies of the province, was most likely of the nature of an alliance. This surmise would agree well enough with the fact that their country lay beyond the southern wall, and with the usual policy of Rome, which offered the Genunians ready means of checkmating their hereditary foes, the encroaching Brigantes of Brythonic stock. Later irruptions into the province by the independent tribes beyond the two Firths are recorded as taking place in 162 and 182. Not long afterwards they appear again in a threatening attitude, though they had been bribed to be quiet for some years. This time they are spoken of as Caledonians and Mæatæ,¹ the latter being in all probability the peoples that lived beyond the Caledonians of the Tay district. Still from Dion Cassius's account they would seem to have by his time got possession of the country adjoining the Northern Wall; possibly they had even then gained a footing on the southern coast of the Firth of Forth. These were the two names under which the independent tribes of the North now made their appearance in history, and the state of things which they had produced was considered serious enough by Severus to demand his presence in the province. He undertook an expedition against them in 208 at the head of a larger force than had ever before threatened their home. The northern confederates sent to sue for peace, which they did not get as they had been hitherto accustomed, since the emperor had resolved to open up the country and make it passable for troops. So Severus set to work making roads, throwing up bridges, and clearing the country of jungles. He appears to have advanced as far as the Moray Firth, and to have returned through the heart of the Highlands, without having to fight a battle, though the continuous skirmishing carried on by the natives cost him the lives of a very large number of his men. When he came back he reconstructed the wall between the Clyde and the

¹ Didot's Pausanias's "Description of Greece," viii. 43.

¹ Reeves's "Adamnan's Life of St. Columba," p. 62.

² Ammian. Marcell., xxvi. 4; xxvii. 8.

¹ Dion Cassius, lxxv. 5; lxxvi. 12, 13.

Forth, but he had not long been at York when the Mæatæ were again in arms, with the Caledonii aiding them.¹ Severus died in 211, and his son Antoninus patched up a peace with the northern enemy.²

Little is known of Britain from that time to the usurpation of power by Carausius in 287, who severed the island for a while from the Roman empire. He had risen to be the head of a fleet intended to repress the Saxons and other German tribes who now ravaged the coasts of Britain and Gaul. He was at length suspected of conniving at their doings; and when Maximus, one of the emperors, resolved to be rid of him, he revolted with his fleet and got possession of Britain, which enjoyed considerable prosperity till his death in 294 at the hand of Allectus, one of his followers. Allectus enjoyed power for three years, when he was slain in 296 in a battle with the army of Constantius Chlorus, who joined Britain again to the Roman empire after ten years of independence. In 306 he seems to have marched an army beyond the wall into the country of the Caledonians and the other Picts, supposed to be the Mæatæ of previous historians. For it is to be remarked here, that by this time the habit of tattooing the body had so far disappeared in Britain that the word pictus, or painted, was now used mostly as synonymous with a native from beyond the Wall of Severus. But in the year 360 the Picts were joined in their ravages by the

¹ Dion Cassius, lxxvi. 15.

² Zonaras, xii. 12 (612).

Scotti, or Scots, from Ireland. They set out most probably from the north-east of the island. When the Romans had left the northern part of the province these invaders had their bands swelled in 364 by the Atecotti, a people inhabiting a part of the country between the walls. At the same time the coast was ravaged by the Saxons, whose piratical descents were directed mostly to various points between the Wash and the Isle of Wight. Theodosius was sent against them in 369, when the Saxons retreated to the Orkneys, the Scots to Ireland, and the Picts to the country north of the Wall of Severus, which was then repaired, while the territory up to it was garrisoned and made into a province called Valentia or Valentiniana, in honour of Valentinian, who was then emperor. And as to the Atecotti, who had been more ferocious in their inroads than the others, they were enrolled in the Roman army, to be stationed on the Continent, so that some of them were seen by St. Jerome, who has left on record the report that they were a British people of cannibals. The Picts, or the independent natives of the north of the island, are again mentioned¹ as two distinct nations, called respectively Dicalidonæ and Verturiones. Under the former name, which seems to mean the people of the two Caledonias, we appear to have to do with the Caledonians proper and the Mæatæ combined, while in later times the word Verturiones yielded in Goidelic the well-known name of the Brythons of the kingdom of Fortrenn: they were possibly the people previously called Boresti,¹ but that is by no means certain.

¹ Ammianus Marcellinus, xxvii. 8.

We have now come to the time of Maximus, who, having served under Theodosius, and afterwards obtained the command of the Roman army in Britain, got himself proclaimed emperor here in 383. He had repressed the Picts and Scots in 384, but soon afterwards, in the year 387, he led the army away, and drained the country of its able-bodied men, in order to contend on the Continent for the imperial power, a struggle which cost him his life in 388. Britain was now exposed to the inroads of the Picts and the Scots, until Stilicho sent hither in 396 a legion which drove them back and once more garrisoned the Northern Wall. In 402 the Roman troops were again withdrawn, and then followed another access of devastation. In answer to the application of the Britons for aid, an army is found to have been present here in 406. In 407, however, it was led away by Constantine, never to return: he was the third emperor made by the army after the time when the invasion of the Roman empire (by the Vandals, the Alans, and other German peoples in the year 406) had inspired the soldiers with fear lest the barbarians might cut them off in an isolated province. This fear was dispelled by Constantine gaining a great victory, which soon made him master of Gaul and Spain, so that the emperor Honorius reluctantly gave him, usurper as he was, a share in the imperial authority. One of Constantine's ablest generals was a Brython called Gerontios, who, after a time, thinking himself slighted by Constantine and his son, set himself to work to overthrow both: among other means he adopted he had recourse to the Germans, whom he invited to invade Gaul and Britain, which they did in 409. Britain had, it is true, from the time the Saxons and the other pirates first made their appearance on her coasts, enjoyed little quiet. Most of Constantine's troops were in Spain, and Honorius, unable to render any aid, wrote letters to the cities of Britain, urging them to defend themselves. They did so, and with such vigour that in the following year, 410, they not only rid themselves of the invaders, but also packed away the few Roman officials, who were still here to carry on the government. Honorius, holding Constantine responsible for the loss of Britain, and the death of certain of his relatives, sent an army against him, when Constantine shut himself up in the town of Arles, where he was killed. This happened in 411, and was followed shortly after by the death of Gerontios. When the latter invited the Germans to invade the provinces, usually consulted the chiefs beneath him (who, in Gaul, survived the kingship to form the senate under the oligarchy in their respective states), and when he had discussed his views with them he declared his plans to a larger assembly and published his decrees by means of it. "In this government," says Mr. Grote,¹ speaking of the Greek king as described in epic poetry, "the authority, which pervades the whole society, all resides in the king. But on important occasions it is exercised through the forms of publicity; he consults, and even discusses, with the council of chiefs or elders—he communicates after such consultation with the assembled Agora,—who hear and approve, perhaps hear and murmur, but are not understood to exercise an option or to reject." This would all apply to ancient Ireland if only for the Greek Agora or the market place we substitute the Irish Aenach or the fair; and presumably also to the Goidelic portions of Britain generally about the time we are speaking of. The old idea of kings and gods probably placed them on somewhat parallel lines, and, as there were gods and goddesses, so there were royal persons of both sexes. In the case of the ancient Gauls this is indicated by the fact that the Gaulish word rix entered into the composition of names not only of men as Orgetorix and Dumnorix, but also of women as Visurix and Biturix. It is etymologically the same vocable as the Latin rex, king, which may possibly have also once been epicene, custom having in the long run ruled in favour of calling a king's wife a regina or royal person of the female sex. The old Irish rí, genitive ríg, king, and rígan, queen, would be somewhat analogous, though the Welsh rhian, the equivalent of the Irish rígan, differs in being mostly a poetic term for a lady, who need not be royal. Whether most of the king-ruled Brythons of Britain were so far rid of the patriarchal idea of monarchy as to let a woman exercise the power of king is not certain; and the history of Boudicca, queen of the Eceui and widow of a king given them probably by the Romans, does not prove the point: still less decisive is the case of Cartismandua, queen of the Brigantes, who is described as married or re-marrying. There is, however, no reason to think that among the older Celtic peoples of Britain a woman could hold supreme power either in the state or in the family. But as the old kingly rule was above all things mainly a large type edition of the power of a father over his household, and as the wife probably occupied a place of authority and respect by his side, so the queen may be supposed to have been similarly placed with regard to the king: the system would have been regarded as incomplete without her, whether we have in view Britain or the sister island. We have an illustration of this in a very curious Irish tale which relates how a king of ancient Éirinn was compelled to marry because the magnates of his realm with one accord flatly refused to hold the great periodical feast of Tara under the presidency of a king who had no wife, so that he was obliged to marry.¹ And as to personal rule altogether, nothing, perhaps, illustrates more compendiously and clearly the difference between the Brythons and the Goidels than the history of an early Celtic word meaning power or authority, which has yielded the Welsh their gwlad in the sense of the state or the country, while in Irish it has taken the form of flaith, which means a lord or prince: the signification had begun to set strongly in that direction as early at least as the tenth century.

¹ Mr. Skene speaks of the latter as Horestii, and connects ("Celtic Scotland," i., pp. 52, 89) with them two inscriptions at Niederbieber, on the Rhine, in which he recognises HOR and H as abbreviations of their name; but Dr. Hübner assures the author of this little book that the one is a part of the word horrei, and the other of honorem, while neither has anything to do with Britain, the Brittones mentioned in one of these being, as he thinks, a Continental people: this is a question we shall have occasion to return to later, but for the inscriptions the reader should turn to Brambach's "Corpus Inscr. Rhenanarum," Nos. 692, 694.

¹ "History of Greece" (the ed. of 1862), ii. 223; see also i. 457, 461.

Exceedingly little is said by ancient authors about the religion of the people of Britain. There is, however, no reason to suppose that, in so far as they were Celts, they had not the same sort of religion as the Gauls, and the Italians, or the Greeks, and other Aryan nations. Cæsar found the Gauls given to the worship of gods, whom he roughly identified with those of Rome, namely, Jove and Minerva, Apollo and Mars, and, above all, Mercury, whom they honoured more than the others. Much the same gods were probably worshipped by the Celts in Britain; and among them must have been the sea-god Nodens, who was of sufficient importance, during the Roman occupation, to have a temple built for him at Lydney on the western side of the Severn, while the Irish formerly called the goddess of the Boyne his wife.² Every locality had its divinity, and the rivers were specially identified with certain divine beings: witness the streams that still bear the name of Dee and kindred ones. The Dee or Deva of North Wales had another name, which appears in Welsh literature as Aerven or the genius of war; and so late as the time of Giraldus it retained some of its ancient prestige: it was still supposed to indicate beforehand the event of the frequent wars between the Welsh and the English by eating away its bank on the Welsh or on the English side, as the case might be. The name of another river marks it out as one that was formerly considered divine, the Belisama, probably our Ribble: the name occurs in inscriptions found in Gaul as that of a goddess equated with the Minerva of Italy.¹ And, like the Greeks and the Romans, the Britons personified diseases, as may be gathered from the fact that in a part of Mid Wales the ague is still known by the name of Y Wrach or Yr hen Wrach, that is, the Hag, or the Old Hag, and from the tradition that Maelgwn, of whom we shall have occasion to speak again, died of the Fad Felen, or Yellow Death, which is described as a strange figure with teeth, eyes, and hair all golden, coming from a neighbouring marsh and fixing her baleful gaze on him in a church he had entered.² This was an elastic system of polytheism,

¹ See Windisch's "Irische Texte," pp. 118, &c.

² See O'Curry's "Manners and Cust. of the Anc. Irish," iii. p. 156, and a remarkable passage in the Book of Leinster, fol. 186 b.

¹ See Orelli, Nos. 1431, 1969, and de Belloguet's "Ethnographie Gauloise," i. p. 375: she is detected also at Carleon on the Usk: see Lee's "Isca Silurum," p. 19.

² See Gee's "Myvyrian Arch. of Wales," p. 296; Pennant's "Tours in Wales," iii. p. 138; and the "Cymmrodor," v. p. 167.

or perhaps, more strictly speaking, not a system at all; and possibly the priesthood it implied did not form a class distinctly marked off from other men; but we have no data; so we must pass on to the non-Celtic natives, who had another religion, namely, druidism, which may be surmised to have had its origin among them. Druidism possessed certain characteristics which enabled it to make terms with the Celtic conqueror, both in Gaul and in the British Islands. A somewhat analogous case was that of the Magi in the East, and that of the non-Aryan peoples of Scandinavia, where the word for a Finn or Lapp is synonymous in Old Norse with that for a sorcerer.¹ Whatever else druidism as a system may have been, magic doubtless constituted one of its most important elements in this country, and the chief means of enabling it to hold its own; for the well-known tendency of higher races to ascribe magical powers to lower ones serves, so far as it goes, to make the position of the latter more tolerable than it would otherwise have been in respect of the treatment dealt to them by their more powerful neighbours.² The Goidelic Celts appear to have accepted druidism, but there is no evidence that it ever was the religion of any Brythonic people.

¹ See Vigfusson's "Icelandic Dict." s. v. Finnar; also Milton's "Par. Lost," ii. 665.

² The whole question has been treated at length by Mr. Tylor in his work on "Primitive Culture," i. pp. 112-117, where a variety of instances are brought together from different parts of the world.

Thus the men of Britain might perhaps be classified, so far as regards religion, into three groups: the Brythonic Celts, who were polytheists of the Aryan type; the non-Celtic natives under the sway of druidism; and the Goidelic Celts, devotees of a religion which combined Aryan polytheism with druidism: here again data are wanting, and one is at a loss to know what people Pliny¹ had in view when he wrote that the wives and daughters-in-law of the Britons attended certain religious rites without their clothing, and with their bodies painted black as if in imitation of Ethiopians. Nor have ancient authors told us much about their most influential order of men, the druids, excepting those of Mona, who witnessed the landing in their island of Suetonius and his troops: these, Tacitus gives one to understand,² stained their altars with the blood of human beings, sought auguries in the entrails of their victims, and practised some, at least, of their cruel rites in groves which the Romans proceeded to cut down. Something is also to be learnt from the use made of the words for druid in the Celtic literatures of later times. Among the oldest instances in Welsh poetry³ of the use of the word derwyddon, druids, is one where it is applied to the Magi or Wise Men, who came with presents to the infant Jesus, and its Irish cognate druí is not only used in the same manner, but is usually rendered into Latin by magus, a magician. Now and then also, point is given to this term by giving the druid the name of Simon Magus, whose appearance on Celtic ground is otherwise inexplicable. The Goidelic druids accordingly appear at times under the name of the School of Simon Druid:¹ they were soothsayers, priests, and medicine men, but their principal character was, perhaps, that of magicians. Thus the lives of St. Patrick describe the druids of the king of Ireland striving to surpass that saint in working miracles: among other things, one of them causes snow to fall so thickly that men quickly find themselves neck-deep in it; and at another time he brings over the plain darkness that might be felt, so that all trembled with fear. But, like Moses with Pharaoh's magicians, Patrick always has the best of it. Indeed, so completely did the Irish recognize the similarity between their magicians and those of the Nile, that a writer of glosses on a ninth century manuscript of St. Paul's Epistles explains to the Irish reader that Jannes and Jambres were the names of two Egyptian druids.² The same was probably the character of the druids of Britain: it certainly was that of those at the non-Celtic court of the Pictish king in the sixth century. A life of St. Columba, written in the seventh century, mentions

¹ "Hist. Nat.," xxii. 1 (2).

² "Ann.," xiv. 29, 30.

³ See an obscure poem in the Book of Taliesin in Skene's "Ancient Books of Wales," vol. ii. p. 174.

¹ A curious passage about Simon drui and his School, kindly pointed out to the writer by Mr. Stokes, occurs in O'Mulconry's Glossary in MS. H. 2, 16 (col. 116) in Trin. Coll. Library, Dublin.

² "Glossæ Hibernicæ," ed. Zimmer, p. 183.

the saint's contests with one of those wizards of the North, who is described as bringing on thick darkness and a great fury of the elements just at the time when he found the saint setting sail on Loch Ness.¹ Nor is it quite certain that the notion of a druid as magician was not the one uppermost in the mind of the fervent writer of an ancient hymn ascribed to St. Columba, who is therein made to say: Christ the son of God is my druid.² Such being the character of the druids in the north of the island in the sixth century, we may suppose that among the Goidels of the more southern parts they were much the same about the time of Cæsar's invasions, namely, a powerful class of men monopolizing the influence of soothsayers, magicians, and priests. But in Gaul, under the faint rays of the civilization of Marseilles and other Mediterranean centres, they seem to have added to their other characters that of philosophers discoursing to the youths whose education was entrusted to them, on the stars and their movements, on the world and its countries, on the nature of things and the power of the gods. The same influence had also probably been operating to soften and moderate the pristine grimness of their practices, and this may be supposed to have been the reason why Gaulish students came to this country to perfect themselves in the druidic system. Here in the western parts of the island it still retained perhaps its most rugged and horrible features unmodified by the Aryan ideas which may have been telling on it in Gaul. It is hard, however, to accept the belief, recorded by Cæsar, that druidism originated here, and was only imported into Gaul: the probability rather is, that the Celts found it both there and here the common religion of the aboriginal inhabitants from the Baltic to Gibraltar. Some of the customs of the pagans of these islands may be detected in the observances of their Christian descendants: thus among many nations a mild form of mutilation is found to have been the symbol of slavery, and the minimum consisted not unfrequently in cutting off some of the hair of the head. Among the Brythons we find in the Welsh romances called the Mabinogion a youth, who wished to become one of Arthur's knights, having his hair cut¹ off by the king with his own hand, but this practice is now best known in the Roman church, where the priest, literally regarded as a servus dei or God's slave, has his crown shaven. The Celtic languages bear ample evidence to the same idea among the Celts: thus, the Welsh word for a hermit, which is meudwy, means God's slave, and such an Irish name as Maelpadraic signifies the bald or tonsured slave of Patrick, and is found Latinized into *Calvus Patricii*² in the ninth century. The tonsure usual in Britain and Ireland was the same, and it was merely a druidic survival; so, when the Church of Rome insisted on the Christians of these islands conforming more completely with its practices, the druidic tonsure was one of the differences which it wished to be rid of. The Irish Church began to conform in this matter of hair-cutting in the year 630, but the British Church held out till 768. There is an exceedingly curious, though somewhat confused passage in the Second Epistle of Gildas, possibly not a part of the original, but written, at any rate, before the druidic tonsure had disappeared: it is to the following effect:¹—"The Britons, contrary to all the world, and hostile to Roman customs not only in the mass but also in the tonsure, are, with the Jews, slaves to the shadow of things to come rather than to the truth. The Romans say that the tonsure of the Britons is reported to have originated with Simon Magus, whose tonsure embraced merely the whole front part of the head from ear to ear, in order to exclude the genuine tonsure of the Magi, whereby the front part alone was wont to be covered. But the originator of this tonsure in Ireland is proved by Patrick's discourse to have been the swineherd of King Loigaire macNéill, from whom nearly all the Irish adopted it." The man meant by Loigaire's swineherd (a mis-translation of maccu) was Dubthach maccu Lugir, who was chief poet of Ireland, at the head of a large number of pupils; and the legend relating how Patrick sought the "materials of a bishop" among his pupils, throws some light on the meaning of the tonsure among the Celts:—"Find for me," said Patrick, "a man of rank, of good family, and good morals, one who has one wife and only one son."—"Why," said Dubthach, "askest thou that, for a man of that sort?"—"To put orders on him," said Patrick.—"Fiacc is the man," said Dubthach: "he is gone on a circuit in Connaught." But just while this conversation is going on Fiacc returns from his circuit, and Dubthach says, "Here is he of whom we spoke."—"Be it so," said Patrick; "but suppose that what we said were not pleasing to him."—"Let preparation be made," said Dubthach, "for tonsuring me, while Fiacc is looking on." Now, as soon as Fiacc saw that, he asked what they were preparing to do. "To tonsure Dubthach," said they.—"That is idle," said Fiacc, "for there is no poet equal to him in Érin."—"Thou wouldst be accepted in his stead?" said Patrick—"The loss of me to Érin," said Fiacc, "is less than that of Dubthach." So Patrick shorn his beard then from Fiacc, and great grace came upon him thereafter . . . so that a bishop's rank was conferred on him, and so that he is archbishop of Leinster thenceforward, and his successor after him."¹ A great deal more might be said on this subject of early Celtic religion; but, as it is a matter of inference rather than of history, it would take up too much of our space to speak of it at length; some points, however, connected with it will again come under the reader's notice as we go on.

¹ Reeves's "Adamnan's Life of St. Columba," p. 149.

² Ibid., p. 74.

¹ Guest's "Mabinogion," ii. 204: it is mistranslated at p. 258.

² Nigra's "Reliquie Celtiche," p. 19.

¹ Haddan and Stubbs's "Councils and Eccl. Doc.," i. pp. 112-3: see also Reeves's notes to his "Columba," p. 350, and above all Bæda's "Hist. Eccl.," v. 21.

¹ The original, of which this is a free rendering, will be found in Stokes's "Goidelica," p. 126, and a shorter version at p. 86.

CHAPTER III.

THE ROMANS IN BRITAIN, AND HOW THEY LEFT IT.

THE first part of this chapter will be devoted to the successive steps taken by the Romans to bring the island into subjection, as well as to the principal events of the Roman occupation ; but only so far as it tends to throw light on the position of the Celtic peoples living here and their relations to one another, since the Roman administration of the government of Britain is to be treated at length in another volume of this series.

For nearly a century after Cæsar's last invasion no attempt was made to bring Britain under real subjection to Rome, but his expeditions had the effect of bringing it into a sort of connection with the Roman world, the influence of which we have already pointed out. In the year 43 Claudius Cæsar resolved to send Aulus Plautius with an army to conquer the island. The same political changes seem to have been then going on here, which Julius Cæsar found at work in Gaul years before, and it is hinted that the nominal connection between Britain and Rome was in danger, owing to exiles from the former being sheltered and protected by Claudius Cæsar. To these we may suppose Bericos, mentioned in the previous chapter, to have belonged. He used his influence to induce Claudius to invade the island, a course which seems to have readily recommended itself to the emperor, who happened to be anxious to find an excuse for enjoying a triumph at Rome. The Roman general is supposed to have landed without opposition, but where it is hard to say. The last view published on the subject is that of Dr. Hübner,¹ who would bring him along the path of the Belgæ to land in the neighbourhood of Southampton, and make him then march northwards to Winchester and Silchester in quest of the enemy. The first mention of an engagement is that of one in which Dion Cassius² tells us that Plautius defeated Caratacos and Togodumnos, the sons of Cunobelinus, who had died not long before. Togodumnos was probably king in the place of his father, with Caratacos ruling over the western portion of the territory over which the Catuvelauni held sway: it was in this district probably that they were defeated; and their flight resulted in bringing the Dobunni who were subject to the Catuvelauni into submission: a Roman force was left among them. Then we read of a series of engagements extending over two days, in which the Britons offered stout resistance to the advance of the Romans, but owing greatly to the skill and bravery of Vespasian, who had been sent over to be the general's lieutenant, the invaders ultimately proved victorious, though the

¹ See his elaborate article entitled "Das Römische Heer in Britannien," Hermes, xvi. p. 527.

² "Roman Hist.," lx. 20, 21.

British charioteers had selected positions of great strength near a deep river, which the Gaulish auxiliaries were the first to cross : they succeeded in wounding the chariot horses of the enemy and in otherwise giving much trouble. Whether that river was the Thames or not, we next read of the native army south of the tidal portion of the latter, and escaping from the Roman legions by crossing it. The Gauls as readily swam across as their insular kinsmen had done, while the Romans crossed higher up the stream by means of a bridge. They gained some advantages over the native forces, but pressing forward too rashly they lost many of their men, while the fall of Togodumnos had the effect of combining his people to avenge his death. Plautius now takes steps to secure the part of the country he had conquered, and advances no further, but sends word to the emperor in accordance with the instructions he had received. The latter accordingly comes in person, and finds the Roman legions awaiting him near the Thames. He crossed the river, and took Camulodunon, which had been the capital of Cunobelinos. Then followed the submission of several tribes, and Claudius, after spending sixteen days in the island, hastened to Rome to enjoy his triumph, and to amuse the Romans with spectacles in which Britain was represented. The operations here up to the time of the emperor's departure resulted in bringing the Catuvelauni and the states dependent on them under Roman rule, together with the district between the Thames and the coast, from the mouth of that river to the neighbourhood of the Isle of Wight. Within this area Rome soon found a princely tool called king Cogidumnos, who had certain cities given him, and who, Tacitus¹ tells us, continued faithful to his imperial masters for many years afterwards. It is not merely an accidental coincidence, perhaps, that an inscription² has been found at Chichester, mentioning a king of that name. He may have been the man or a descendant of his, and his subjects may have been the Regni, who inhabited what is now Sussex. Plautius was left in Britain with orders to carry on the work of conquest, but he appears at Rome in the year 47, to receive an ovation for having managed the war with ability. Several historians dwell also on the deeds of Vespasian, who, as they assert, engaged the enemy no less than thirty times both under Plautius and the emperor. He also reduced the two most powerful peoples of Britain, together with more than twenty towns and the Isle of Wight.³ His son Titus likewise served here, and is mentioned as having once rescued his father when hemmed in by the enemy on all sides. Who the two most powerful peoples of Britain subdued by Vespasian may have been we are not told, but they were most likely the Belgæ and the Dumnonii, who occupied nearly the whole of the south-west of the island, including the tin districts, which cannot have escaped the attention of the Romans, whose operations are spoken of, by the time of the departure of Plautius, as having made Britain emphatically a part of the Roman empire.

¹ "Agricola," 14.

² The Berlin "Corpus Insc. Lat.," vol. vii. no. 11.

³ Suetonius, "Vespasian," chap. 4.

According to Tacitus, the principal authority on the later Roman conquests in Britain, the command of the legions here was given to Ostorius in the year 50. He at once adopted active measures against the tribes who were openly defiant, disarmed those whom he suspected of being disaffected, and prepared to keep in check all those who dwelt on his side of the Severn and the Trent,¹ which rivers may be taken as marking the boundary of the province at the time. Among the consequences of his policy may be reckoned the revolt of the powerful people of the Eteni, who had hitherto accepted the alliance of the Romans and escaped the bitter experiences of war. They now succeeded in persuading neighbouring states to join them, and chose a strong position, which they fortified in a skilful fashion and afterwards defended with great valour, but in vain. After humbling the Eteni, Ostorius led his men across the island until they reached a point not far from the sea which looks he probably intended thereby to secure Britain for himself; but, while the Roman force which had disposed of Constantine was in quest of Gerontios, his own men conspired against him and set fire to his dwelling. He defended himself for a while, aided by a servant, who was a German of the nation of the Alans, but at length he found himself forced to slay his servant and his wife at their own request, and then to put an end to his own life: his son fled for refuge to the Alans. Such is a summary of his history given by the contemporary writers, Olympiodorus and Zosimus. In Gerontios, one recognizes at once the unmistakable features of the Vortigern of the well-known Hengist story, which is read first in the pages of Bæda and Nennius, while only a few of its elements can be detected in the writings of Gildas in the latter part of the sixth century.

¹ This is the meaning of a passage in the "Annals," xii. 31, where Mr. Henry Bradley happily conjectures (the Academy, April 28, 1883, p. 296) that we should read, cunctosque cis Trisantonam et Sabrinam fluvios cohibere parat. He seems to be also right in regarding Trisantonam as the early form of the name Trent.

In order to form an idea of what happened in Britain after the Roman officials were driven away, we must briefly relate how it was ruled as a part of the Roman empire. From the time of Severus the province was divided into Upper and Lower Britain; and Dion Cassius¹ gives us to understand that the legions stationed at Caerleon on the Usk and Chester on the Dee were in Upper Britain, while that located at York was in Lower Britain. This statement has been supposed to prove that the Romans were guided in their division of the island by the parallels of latitude rather than by the natural features of the country, which suggest a boundary marked by the Bristol

¹ lv. 23.

Channel, the Severn, the Avon, the hills beginning between the Dove and the Derwent, and extending as far as the Tees: all east and south of such a line would be Lower Britain, consisting of the area covered by the province which Ostorius left bounded by the line of the Severn and the Trent, with the plain in which York stands added to it, and possibly also the coast from the Tees to the Tyne. The country beyond it stretching from the Bristol Channel to the Solway Frith, and embracing two mountainous tracts with the level ground of Cheshire and South Lancashire lying between them, would form Upper Britain. It has, however, occurred to an Italian authority¹ on Roman administration, that it was the custom of the Romans to call the portion of a country nearest to Rome upper, and that further off lower; but this conclusion drawn from the geographical accident, that few of the great rivers of Europe could be said to flow in the direction of Rome, only shows, when the facts are examined, that the Romans, like other people, allowed the ready test of running water to decide what was upper and what lower. Thus they spoke of a Lower Germany at the mouth of the Rhine, and of an Upper Germany higher up that river; similarly, on the Danube, they had an Upper Pannonia and an Upper Mœsia, situated in the same relation to Lower Pannonia and Lower Mœsia; nor do they seem to have proceeded differently when at one time they spoke of Dalmatia as Upper Illyricum; not to mention that Lower Egypt seems to have always been nearer to Rome than Upper Egypt. So it is natural to suppose that Upper Britain was mainly that part of Roman Britain which the legions had to approach by marching in the direction of the sources of the Thames, and of the streams that meet to form the Humber. In an arrangement made by Diocletian, and perfected by Constantine the Great, the two Britains were subdivided, Upper Britain into prima and secunda, or first Britain and second Britain, and Lower Britain into Maxima Cæsariensis and Flavia Cæsariensis. In the case of these last pairs of adjectives, the word Britannia was dispensed with, so that it came to be more closely associated with Upper Britain. Subsequently to the formation of Valentia into a separate province in 369, a survey of the great offices of the empire, or, as it is usually called, the Table of Dignities, gives us the names of the British provinces in the following order: Maxima Cæsariensis, Valentia, Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, Flavia Cæsariensis.¹ Here as elsewhere in the Western Empire the sequence was not intended to be that of locality, but of the dignity² of the governors of the respective provinces, and we learn from the same Table that the men in charge of Maxima Cæsariensis and Valentia were of consular rank, while those at the head of the other three, being of lower rank, were called presides or presidents. No less than three other lists exist of the provinces of Roman Britain, and at least two of them are older than the one we have mentioned.¹ In all the order varies, but always so as to keep the two Britannias together. Roman Britain was sometimes spoken of as a province, but technically it was a diocese, consisting of five provinces under the rule of a vice-prefect or vicar, as he was called. The vicar of Britain was responsible to the pretorian prefect of the Gauls, who had under his authority the vicars also of Gaul and Spain, so that his power reached from the Firth of Forth to North Africa. He had to do with finance and the administration of justice, while the military command was divided between three generals, called the Count of Britain, the Count of the Saxon Shore in Britain, and the Duke of the Britains. This last was so called because probably he had to do mainly with the two Britannias or provinces of Upper Britain, but towards the close of the Roman occupation the forces under his command were located in places which were mostly, if not all, in the northern part of the territory intrusted to him for its defence, especially the stations on the Southern Wall; and for military purposes it is probable that the part of Lower Britain north of the Humber sooner or later had to be treated as a part of Upper Britain. The Count of the Saxon Shore had under his command the troops stationed at various points between the Wash and the Isle of Wight, the coast which was most exposed to invasion from Saxons and kindred Germans. As to the Count of Britain, the entire diocese was under his control, and his command does not appear localized like that of the other two. On the whole, his position seems to have been analogous to that of the Count of Italy in the Neighbourhood of the Alps, and of the Count of the Territory around Strassburg: both of these had districts in their charge, which were subject, like Britain, to the inroads of the Germans.¹

¹ See Borghese, "Opera Omnia," iv. p. 458: his view has been accepted by Dr. Hübner in the "Corpus Inscr. Lat.," vii. p. 4.

¹ "Notitia Dignitatum," ed. Otto Seeck, pp. 105, 107, 111, 172.

² See Mommsen in the "Abhandl. d. Ak. d. Wissenschaften zu Berlin," 1862, pp. 510, 511.

¹ See Mommsen's paper just referred to.

In the course of the Roman occupation, which lasted more than three centuries and a half, most of the Celts of the province had both become Christians, and grown familiar, to some extent, with the working of municipal institutions, which here and there probably survived the hurried departure of the officials of the empire, who were, doubtless, highly unpopular wherever they settled. It may further be supposed that Latin was beginning to make rapid conquests: not only was it the official language of the province, but, in all probability, it was the ordinary means of communication over a considerable area of the south and east of the island, where, more than elsewhere perhaps, the descendants of the motley population that had followed the Roman standards hither formed the nucleus of a Latinizing party. Among its strongholds may safely be reckoned York, Lincoln, Colchester, and London, which was even then so ancient a town that the Roman attempt to change its name for ever into Augusta has so far failed that it is now known to few. But, whatever Roman refinement and institutions survived in this country, the study of Roman inscriptions found in the province cannot fail to show that, as compared with most of the other portions of the empire, Britain was remarkable for its military character and the little consideration, relatively speaking, it allowed the civil element. This arose in the first instance probably from the warlike temper of the people, together with the time and trouble it took to subdue them, and later, from the necessity of being constantly prepared to ward off the outer barbarians, who granted the province no repose. At all events, it is from the military point of view that we set out with most hope of being able to pick up the thread of transition that should guide us through the mazes of the dark period of history extending to the latter part of the 6th century.

¹ "Not. Dig.," pp. 180, 182, 209, 173, 179.

It would be a mistake to take for granted that the people of Roman Britain, as soon as they were rid of the officials of the empire, resolved themselves into small communities or tribal states independent of each other—a stage which the Britons had pretty well left behind them before the Roman Conquest, and it is not to be believed that the prolonged lesson of imperial centralization had been altogether lost on them. Did they proceed, then, to choose an emperor or a sole king? There is no satisfactory proof that anything of the kind occurred to them, and they seem rather to have simply persisted on the lines of the military leaderships which the Romans had made a reality among them. What became of the office of the Count of Britain we know not, but there are reasons to think that those of the Duke of the Britanniæ and the Count of the Saxon Shore continued, doubtless in a modified form, to exist long afterwards. How that should have come to pass is by no means hard to see. Even when Maximus took away the army in 387, it is not improvable that he placed a small native force to defend the north of the province against the Picts and Scots, and another to watch the south-eastern coast. It is very probable that the commander of the legion that came here afterwards and left in 402 did the same thing on a larger scale. And, as to the final departure of the legions for Gaul under Constantine in 409, we are told by Gildas that the Romans, when on the point of going away, not only urged the Britons to defend themselves, but that, in order to help them in so doing, they had a wall built for them in the north, and gave them the fortifications to garrison, while on the south-eastern shore, which had been guarded by a Roman fleet, they built towers at intervals within sight of the sea, which were also to help the inhabitants in their defence of the country. This implies that the Britons were to have an army in the north and another in the south-east; and that these armies were a reality is proved by their successfully repelling the Germans in 410, and by the comparatively small extent to which the Picts from beyond the Friths were, in the long run, able to settle themselves in the country between the Walls. Those armies took possession, doubtless, of the quarters left by the Roman troops, and it is highly probable that their leaders were regarded as the regular successors of the Dux Britanniarum and the Comes Litoris Saxonici, and as having a right to those titles. The difference between a comes or count, and a dux or leader, was only an unimportant one of imperial etiquette in favour of the former; the office of both was called a ducatus, and both comes and dux appear to have been rendered into Welsh by the term Gwledig, a ruler or prince, which is the title always given in Welsh literature to Maximus, who was probably Duke of the Britannias before he made himself emperor. It is a significant fact, that those who seem to have succeeded to supreme power here when the Romans left are always styled in Welsh literature Gwledig, instead of being described by any title signifying emperor or the familiar office of king, with the exception of Arthur.

The man to whom Gildas and Nennius, together with Welsh tradition generally, point as the one who succeeded to the command of the Count of the Saxon Shore, or, as we may put it, the one who became the Gwledig of Lower Britain, appears under the name of Ambrosius Aurelianus or Aurelius Ambrosius, while in Welsh literature the name becomes Emrys. According to Gildas, who wrote not more than one hundred and fifty years after the time of Ambrosius, and who loudly sings his praises, he was descended from a Roman family which had enjoyed the purple of office, but his relations had been killed in the contests with the Saxons, or some of the other Germans who harassed the coast: possibly Nectarides, Count of the Saxon Shore, who was slain by them in 364, was of his family. So far as his history can be made out, Ambrosius was a very fit man for his work, and one calculated to enlist on his side the lively sympathies of the Latinizing party. But Nennius darkly hints that there was opposition to him, and that he had to fight with a certain Guitolin, who was possibly the head of a faction opposed to the Latinizing element. It would seem to have been overcome, for we find the title of Gwledig confined to Ambrosius, who, according to Gildas, was the leader of the Britons in their successful effort to drive away the Germans. They, however, must have soon returned, as we find them gradually seizing on one portion after another of Lower Britain. How much of this Ambrosius lived to see cannot be ascertained, but the following are the names of the English states which rose south of the Humber, together with their traditional dates, which will do well enough for our purpose:—

In 449 the Jutes had established themselves in Kent, the country of the ancient Cantii, and they also possessed themselves of the Isle of Wight, together with the nearest portion of the mainland. The setting up of the kingdom of the South Saxons, now represented by the County of Sussex, and surrounded then by the great forest of Anderida, is ascribed to the year 477: this was the country of the ancient Regni. In 495 another and greater Saxon power, that of the West Saxons or Wessex, is represented as springing up in what is now Hampshire, and rapidly enlarging itself at the expense of the old inhabitants of the Belgic districts. Some time in the sixth century there arose also an East Saxon kingdom, the name of which survives in that of the County of Essex, once the land of the Trinovantes, and of the Roman colony of Camulodunon: it is this colony, probably, that has yielded the English town its name of Colchester. The district between Essex and the Wash, where the Eteni formerly dwelt, was taken by the Angles, who formed a South Folk and a North Folk. Other Angles seized on the coast between the Wash and the Humber, which formerly belonged to the Coritani. In time these Anglian settlers came to be included in the great kingdom which rose last into prominence and power, that of the men who went up the Trent into the heart of the country and fixed, against the Welsh, the frontier or march, from which the whole has come to be known to historians by the would-be Latin name of Mercia. Besides this it took in the West Saxon conquests north of the Thames, and most of the region covered by the Midland Counties of modern England. From the early contact with the West Saxons into which the Celtic inhabitants were forced, they learned to call them by their national name of Saxons, which, slightly modified into Saeson, has come to be the Welsh word for Englishmen generally.

Welsh legend associates the name of Ambrosius mostly with the southern portion of Lower Britain, especially with Ambresburh or Amesbury in Wiltshire, a part of the country where the contest with the West Saxons was probably very severe. About the middle of the sixth century Gildas, a Welsh monk, to whom we have already alluded, denounced in the bitterest style of the Hebrew prophets the princes of his race and time; but of the five he preaches at only two seem to have belonged to Lower Britain,¹ Constantine, king of Dumnonia, in modern terms, Devon and Cornwall, and Aurelius Conan, as to whose territory Gildas gives no hint, though it may be guessed to have been the country which happened to be still in the possession of the Brythons east of the Severn Sea. Gildas appears to have been well acquainted with the descendants of Ambrosius Aurelianus: he gives one to understand that they were still in power; and perhaps Aurelius Conan was their head, a view to which his name lends some support. Welsh tradition calls him Kynan, and gives him the title of Gwledig, but the charge Gildas brings against him, of thirsting for civil war, would seem to imply that he was unable to maintain his supremacy without using force. What portion of the original power of the Gwledig still belonged in reality or in theory to his family, we have no means of making out; but it was probably under the head of it that the great battle of Mons Badonicus, of uncertain site, was fought, according to Bæda, in the year 493,¹ when the Welsh gained an important victory, which is sometimes attributed to Arthur. After this the West Saxons seem to have remained quiet most of the time till the reign of Ceawlin, who became king in 556, and fought against the Welsh, both along the Thames and the Severn, winning a great victory over them at a place called Deorham in 577. This battle, in which fell three Welsh kings (called in the Saxon Chronicle Conmægl, Condidan and Farinmægl), was followed by Ceawlin taking possession of the important towns of Bath, Gloucester, and Cirencester, whereby the West Welsh, as those of the peninsula south of the Severn Sea came to be called, were completely severed from their kinsmen. After the death of Condidan, in whom one recognizes² the Kynddyylan of Welsh literature which connects him with what is now Shropshire, his country was fearfully ravaged by Ceawlin, and his court at Pengwern or Shrewsbury given to the flames.³ These northern conquests were lost by Ceawlin, owing to a serious defeat at Fethanleag, supposed to be Faddiley, on the borders of Cheshire, in the year 584; but it is to him that we have to ascribe the advancement of the Saxon boundary on the south to the Axe, while what ¹ This date will be found discussed and established by M. de la Borderie in the "Revue Celtique," vi. pp. 1-13.

¹ Haddan and Stubbs's "Councils," &c., i. pp. 49-51.

² Green's "Making of England," pp. 128, 206.

³ Skene's "Anc. Books of Wales," ii. pp. 279, &c.

still remained in the possession of the Welsh of the country east of the Axe and the Parret appears to have been conquered by the Saxons under Cénwalh, who died in 672. In the eighth century Ine of Wessex seems to have succeeded in advancing the Saxon boundary to Taunton, though he had to fight with a very able prince of the Brythons of those parts, whose name appears in Welsh literature as Geraint; and we read of Devon being under English rule in the time of Ecgbyrht, who ravaged Cornwall in 815. Still the Welshmen of that peninsula do not seem to have been wholly subjected to English rule until the time of Æthelstán, who fixed on the Tamar as their eastern boundary. It is needless to add that they continued to be Celtic for a long time afterwards, and that their language finally died out only about a hundred years ago.

Now that we have very briefly shown how the English mastered Lower Britain, the question arises, how far the old inhabitants were allowed to remain. It has sometimes been supposed, that, as long as the conquerors continued to be pagans, they gave the former no quarter; but a more humane treatment may be expected to have prevailed with them after their adoption of Christianity: some of the principal dates implied are the following:—Eadwine, King of Northumbria, was converted in 627; Cynegils, King of Wessex, was baptized in 635, and his son in the following year; Mercia was pagan until Penda's death in 655, but under his sons it became Christian. The conquests by those states after the above dates need, therefore, not imply a complete displacement of the previous population, and there are not wanting indications that there were even as late as the time of Æthelstán in the tenth century patches of country, especially in Wessex, which were under English rule, but still inhabited by the Welsh, who only ceased to be such by being gradually assimilated to the Saxons around them. The subject, which is a difficult one, will be found discussed in another volume of this series; but, on the whole, one may consider that it still remains to be proved that the ancient inhabitants were not to a certain extent allowed to remain as slaves and tillers of the ground, even in the south and the east, and districts where they did not succeed in maintaining themselves in their towns until the conquerors became Christians. On the other hand, those who are inclined to think that the Celts and Latinizing populations were cut clean off the ground must not make too much of the negative argument, that English in its earliest stages contains hardly any words borrowed from Celtic; for the language of a considerable portion of the south and east of the island may be supposed to have become Latin by the time of the English conquest. Indeed it has been argued with great probability that the inhabitants of Britain, whom the English first called Wealas, or Welshmen, were not the Brythons, or Brettas, as they termed them, but the provincial Romans, or the Latinizing part of the population,¹ though the name got eventually to include the Brythonic Celts of the west of the island. In that case what should rather be asked is, how many Latin words there are to be found in the earliest known specimens of English. Much the same remarks apply, of course, to Upper Britain, with which we have next to deal.

¹ See Coote's "Romans of Britain," pp. 176-180.

CHAPTER IV.

THE KYMRV.

LET us now see what became of the people of Upper Britain when the Romans went away. Before that event the Picts and Scots had more than once been able to carry their plundering expeditions into the heart of the province; but the comparative efficiency of the native army, which undertook the defence of the north, is proved by the fact that the only settlement worth mentioning which the northern tribes were able permanently to make within what had been Roman Britain was that effected by the Picts on the southern side of the Frith of Forth. It is called in Welsh Manaw of the Gododin, to distinguish it from another Manaw beyond the Forth, as well as from the Isle of Man, which appears in the same language as the Island of Manaw. This Pictish settlement included the part of Lothian in which Edinburgh is situated, and a portion of the Pentland Hills, a name in which we are supposed to have a corruption of Pehkland, the land of the Peht or Pict. These, however, were not the only Picts south of the Northern Wall: the district on the Solway, between the Nith and Loch Ryan, was inhabited in Bæda's time by a people whom he terms Picts, though the name got eventually to include the Brythonic Celts of the west of the island. In that case what should rather be asked is, how many Latin words there are to be found in the earliest known specimens of English. Much the same remarks apply, of course, to Upper Britain, with which we have next to deal.

name of the Brigantes : thus the term Bernicii would seem to have meant the people of the Brigantian land, which, in this case, was mostly that of the ancient Otadini, or Gododin of Welsh literature, together with a part possibly of that of a kindred people, the Dumnonii. Another Anglian people had seized on the country of the ancient Parisi between the Humber and the Tees. Like the northern Angles, but unlike the other Angles and the Saxons, they also got to be known by a name of Celtic origin. In Latin they have been called, from Bæda's time, Deiri, and their country Deira, both suggested by the English pronunciation of one or more forms derived from the same source as the Welsh name of the district or of its old inhabitants: this was Deivr, which has probably come down from early times, though it is not read in any ancient author. It is not known at what date Bernicia extended itself southwards to the Tees, so as to have a common boundary with Deira ; nor is much known at all about the latter, till the time of Æthelfrith, a king of the Bernicians whom we shall have to mention again : he died in 617. He had taken possession of Deira and made himself king of both states, and thenceforth Deira and Bernicia were sometimes separate and sometimes united. In the latter case the whole is known as Northumberland, or else in quasi-Latin as Northumbria, which may serve to prevent the thoughtless from confounding the whole with the part that forms the county now bearing the former name.

But even after the encroachments, briefly described as ultimately embracing the whole seaboard from the Humber to the Frith of Forth, the tract of country still in the possession of the Celts of Upper Britain was very considerable, comprising all the west of the island from the Severn Sea to the Solway Firth and thence to the Clyde. But was it anything more than a tract of the island in the meagre geographical sense, and did it contain any of the political essentials of a state? This would seem at first sight to admit of no other than a negative answer, and its length of indefensible frontier would have led one to expect that it would be divided in a short time into two or more pieces. But, as a matter of fact, we find that it kept together for more than two hundred years; that when it was permanently cut in two, in consequence of the defeat of the Welsh at the great battle of Chester and the events that followed, it roused them to a fierce struggle; and that, when this ended unfavourably to themselves, it was regarded as the destruction of all their aspirations and the rudest shock ever given their traditions. Neither had Upper Britain the advantage of being the patrimony of a single and homogeneous race; for not only were there Picts in Galloway, but the north-west of the Principality of Wales, and a great portion of the south of it, had always been in the possession of a Goidelic people, whose nearest kinsmen were the Goidels of Ireland. As to the other Celts of Upper Britain, that is to say, the Britons proper or Brythons, they were no doubt in the ascendant, but there were also Brythonic communities elsewhere, some north of the Forth, about whom little is known, some south of the Severn Sea, and some in a Britain of their own in Gaul. Yet the ties of union between those of Upper Britain proved so strong and close, that the word Kymry, which merely meant fellow-countrymen, acquired the force and charm of a national name, which it still exercises over the natives of the Principality. This name is better known to Englishmen in connection with Cumberland or its Latinized form Cumbria, and the still more distorted one of Cambria. Nor was a common name the only or most important outcome of this feeling of unity; for the Kymry developed a literature of their own, differing from that of the other Brythonic communities: above all, the destruction of their state in the seventh century is the burning theme of many a Welsh poem, sung in a language now but imperfectly understood. But since the union of the Kymry seems to have been neither dictated by reasons of geography and frontier, nor clearly defined for them by considerations of race, we have to look for the historical accidents which served to determine it in the first instance and to invest it afterwards with an intelligible form. This takes us again back to the last years of the Roman occupation.

The Romans were in the habit of forcing the natives of Britain, like those of their other provinces, to enrol themselves in the imperial army, and at first it was, doubtless, the rule for them to serve on the Continent, far away from their kith and kin; but as danger ceased at length to be apprehended from the provincials themselves, and came to be expected from without, some of the native troops were allowed to serve in Britain. Inscriptions and other documents give us the locality and official names of a few such regiments posted in the northern part of the province. Both during the absence of the Roman troops previous to 410, and after the final departure of the officials of the empire in that year, the work of defence devolved on the inhabitants, and it is by no means probable that any corner of the country went to be under the charge of the Dux Britanniarum could be excused from supplying the native army with its quota of men who were to fill the place of his soldiers, any reluctance which may have here and there shown itself being promptly borne down by the pressing necessity of acting in concert for the defence of the country against the barbarians, who were pushing their way southwards. So it may be gathered that it was the fact of being under the charge of a single general, the Dux Britanniarum, which had the effect of marking off from the other Brythons those who afterwards gave themselves the name of Kymry, and of first teaching them, perhaps, in some measure to act together; but it was probably the violence of the invader from without that supplied the force which was to weld them more closely together. The area of the country to which this applies was most likely coextensive with the military authority of the Dux Britanniarum, but unfortunately the boundaries of the latter can only be guessed, partly as already hinted, and partly from the indications we have as to the territory which the Kymry called their own after Britain was severed from the empire. The earliest of their native rulers, so far as we know, was a man called Cunedag or Cunedda about whom Welsh literature has a good deal to say, though not enough to give us a complete view of his history. His name is Celtic, and tradition, which makes him a son of a daughter of Coel, speaks of him as a man from Coelin.¹ This would connect him with the North, where Coel's country seems to have been the district since called Kyle, in the present county of Ayr. It is from the North also, from Manaw of the Gododin, that Nennius describes him and his sons as coming into Wales, and, for anything we know, he may have been the head of one of the noble families of the Brigantes; but it is not improbable that he had also Roman blood in his veins, for we find that the names of his father and grandfather were Æternus and Paternus, whose father was named Tacitus. Further, some of his ancestors had very probably worn the official purple under the Roman administration, which derives support from the fact that the Welsh pedigrees² always give Paternus or Padarn the epithet of Peisrudd or him of the red tunic. All this would, no doubt, greatly help Cunedda into a position of influence and authority: the following things are in point, and more or less clearly asserted by Welsh tradition:—That Wales was under his sway and that of his sons; that his power was supreme from Carlisle to Caer Weir, supposed to be Wearmouth on the eastern coast, where the territory of the Angles was not destined to become suddenly continuous; that he had his court at Carlisle;¹ that his retinue on the wall consisted of 900 horse;² that he wore the badge of office of the Dux Britanniarum, which, as in the case of other duces under the Empire, consisted of a gold belt,³ to which an obscure passage in a Welsh poem⁴ seems to allude as Cunedda's girdle; and that he was the ancestor from whom a great number of the more remarkable saints of Wales traced their descent. The account which Nennius⁵ gives of Cunedda states that he and his sons came to Wales from Manaw of the Gododin 146 years before the reign of Maelgwn, the most powerful of his descendants. This would seem to allude to the time

¹ See the elegy on Cunedda in the Book of Taliesin in Skene's "Ancient Books of Wales," ii. pp. 200-2; also the "Iolo MSS.," pp. 120, 121, 126.

² See the Harleian MS., 3859, fol. 193^b, at the British Museum.

¹ "Iolo MSS.," p. 147, where Cunedda the Gwledig is styled king of the Island of Britain.

² This is alluded to in the elegy already mentioned.

³ Gibbon's "Roman Empire" (Smith's Ed.), ii. p. 320 (chap. xvii.).

⁴ It is the elegy already mentioned, and the word used is crys, which now only means a shirt; but it seems to have meant a girdle in another old poem given in Skene's "Anc. Bks. of Wales," ii. p. 267, &c., and the cognate Irish criss always meant a girdle, while the intermediate meaning of the Welsh word as that of an upper dress is attested by passages in "The Mabinogion" (Guest's ed.), ii. p. 13; iii. p. 266.

⁵ See San-Marte's "Nennius and Gildas," p. 72.

when the Picts succeeded in possessing themselves of a part of Manaw, and it settles the date as falling somewhere very near the departure of the Romans from Britain.

Nennius, in speaking of Cunedda's sons, says that they were eight,¹ but later versions of the legend add to their number and trace to their names those of various districts in Wales. Among other things we are told that the eldest son died before leaving the North, that his son inherited among his uncles, and that his name, which was Meirion, clung to the district still called Meirion or Merioneth; but another story, preserved by Geoffrey of Monmouth, makes Meirion, whom he calls Margan, brother to Cunedda, who slays him in battle in the land bearing his name. Keredig, another son of Cunedda, left his name to Keredigion, our Cardiganshire; and similarly in the case of others of his sons, who are said to have left their names to districts lying more towards the north-west of Wales. With the exception of a part of Merioneth, this probably represents the encroachments of the Brythons on the territory which belonged to peoples of the Goidelic branch, the Scotti of Nennius. He mentions them as driven out of the country with terrible slaughter by Cunedda and his Sons, the limits of whose territory in Wales are afterwards variously stated to have been the Dee and the Teivi,² the southern boundary of Cardiganshire, or the Dee and a stream called the

¹ See San-Marte's "Nennius and Gildas," p. 72.

² Harleian MS., 3859, fol. 195*a*.

Gwaun,¹ which reaches the sea at Abergwaun or Fishguard in Pembrokeshire. The centre of gravity, so to speak, of the power of Cunedda in Wales was in the country of the Ordovices, a Brythonic people that does not seem to have resisted his rule. Nor do we find a clue to any complication with the Silures of the south-east of Wales; so it may be presumed that they also acquiesced in the supremacy of Cunedda. How, then, was his power established here in the first instance? The only answer we can suggest is that his rule was recognized as that of the Gwledig, or perpetuator of the command of the Dux Britanniarum; that the office gave him the means of making his sons kings of various districts in Wales; and that, the Goidels of the south and the north-west being opposed to his rule, his sons gratified the Brythons by giving them their land. Probably Cunedda, while enjoying the power of the Gwledig as far as the Severn Sea, identified himself more closely with the part of his charge north and east of the Dee; nay, it is even possible that he never visited Wales in person at all. But, in any case, he found the means of bequeathing to his descendants power of two kinds, that is to say, power over the special districts which they then treated as their own, and the power of the Gwledig, which they seem to have jealously kept among themselves for centuries afterwards. Some light is thrown on the Scotti of Nennius by the Irish story² of the banishment from Munster of a people called the

¹ "Lives of the Cam.-Brit. SS.," p. 101.

² This will be found in the Book of the Dun, fol. 53a—54b;

Déisi, who are said to have sailed to Dyved and to have made a settlement there.

We have, however, no knowledge who were the Gwledigs of the Kymry for more than a hundred years after Cunedda's time; but about the middle of the sixth century we have again the help of the writings of Gildas, in which he denounces five princes of his time:¹ three of these appear to have had their homes in Wales. Their names were Vortiporios, which in the Welsh pedigrees becomes Guortepir;² Cuneglasos, later Cinglas and Cynlas; and Maglocunos, a name better known in Wales in its later form of Maelgwn. Now Gildas, while bringing against Maelgwn very grievous charges, of the grounds of which we have no means of forming an opinion, gives one to understand that he had for a time been a monk and had for instructor one of the most accomplished men in Britain, who, it may be inferred from a life of St. Cadoc, was no other than that philosophizing saint himself.³ Gildas not only represents Maelgwn as a great warrior, and superior in stature to the other princes he names, but he alludes more than once to the fact of his standing far above them also in point of authority and power. Cuneglasos or Cynlas is not described in such a way that we can be sure where he ruled, but the name was borne by a also in the Bodley Manuscripts, Laud Misc. 610, fol. 99*b* 2; and Rawlinson, B. 502, fol. 72*a* 2.

¹ Hadd. and Stubbs's "Councils," &c., i. pp. 50-56.

² Harleian MS. 3859, fol. 193*b*.

³ See the "Lives of the Cam.-Brit. SS.," p. 52.

grandson of Cunedda's son Einion, of whom Maelgwn was also grandson, while a story recorded in the Iolo Manuscripts¹ mentions Cynlas as lord of Glamorgan and father of St. Cadoc, and differs in this particular from the usual account. But it by no means follows that we are to reject it, as the history of St. Cadoc is a most difficult one, there having been, as it would seem, more than one saint of that name or similar ones. Then as to Vortiporios, whom Gildas terms tyrant of the Demetæ or the people of Dyved, he was probably king of the portion of Dyved which had not been included in Keredig's territory. Vortiporios was the direct representative of the leader of the exiles from Munster who settled in Dyved, and he had doubtless to submit to the power of the Cunedda family, which is corroborated by the fact that Keredig's grandson, St. David, was about this time establishing himself as bishop in the latter region. Now the head of that family was, at this time, undoubtedly Maelgwn, whose authority reached to every corner of Wales. His own kingdom, however, was that of Venedot, Gwyndod or Gwynedd, the last of which is a name that now means all North Wales; but it appears at one time to have denoted, more strictly speaking, that portion of it, approximately, which is covered by the Vale of Clwyd and the district west of it and north of the Mawddach. Gildas gives us no clue to the history of the Kymry from the Dee to the Clyde, and most other sources of information on the point have long since been closed by the disappearance of Welsh and Welsh traditions in Cumbria. But what Gildas tells us about the many princes Maelgwn had overthrown, as well as the obscure allusions in Welsh poetry to Maelgwn and his hosts in the North, together with the later history of the Kymry, would tend to show that whatever princes reigned over them north and east of the Dee, must have done so subject to Maelgwn as Gwledig or whatever the leadership had by his time begun to be called.

¹ P. 171.

Brave and intrepid in war as Maelgwn undoubtedly was, his authority was certainly not altogether the direct result of his success in the field : it was in part at least due to the standing rule of the princes of the house of Cunedda, whereby one of them obtained the office of Gwledig, or, as it might now be termed, that of over-king. This is very clearly seen, as far as regards Wales, in a story invented afterwards to account for Maelgwn's supremacy : it occurs in some of the manuscripts of the Welsh Laws,¹ and is to the following effect :—The nation of the Kymry, after losing the crown and sceptre of London and being driven out of England, assembled by agreement to decide who should be chief king over them. The place of meeting was Maelgwn's Strand, near the mouth of the river Dovey, whither came the leading men from all parts of Wales ; and there Maeldav the Elder (lord of Moel Esgidion in Merioneth, according to one version, but of Pennardd in Arvon according to another) placed Maelgwn in a chair cunningly made of birds' wings. So, when the tide rose, it drove all away except Maelgwn, whom his chair enabled to stay, and thereby he became chief king, and his word and law paramount over the other princes, without being himself bound by theirs, while Maeldav for his services on the occasion obtained certain privileges for his own lordship. This legend, whatever else it teaches, clearly shows that Maelgwn's supremacy was the result in some way or other of the suffrages of the other princes of the Kymry. We have no means of ascertaining how the selection was usually made ; but as a rule the most shrewd and powerful member of the family of Cunedda managed to get himself declared head or over-king, and this may be supposed to have not unfrequently been the cause of quarrels and civil wars.

¹ See the 8vo edition of 1841, vol. ii. pp. 49-51 ; also the "Iolo MSS.," pp. 73-74.

Not only was Maelgwn beyond doubt the greatest prince of the Kymry from the time of Cunedda, but he succeeded in so strengthening the position of his family that the over-kingship remained afterwards with his descendants. This will appear from a brief outline of their history. Maelgwn's son Rhun, who inherited his father's power, had only a portion of his ability, and the manuscripts of the Welsh Laws¹ speak of Gwynedd being devastated in Rhun's time by the Men of the North, and of his successfully carrying the war into that region, where the men of Arvon distinguished themselves in the van of his hosts in crossing the Forth. Rhun had a son Beli, of whom nothing is known : he may have died before his father, but he left a son Iago, who fell with several other Welsh princes in the battle of Chester in 613. For anything known to the contrary, he may have for a short time enjoyed the position of over-king of the Kymry and acted as their general in that war ; but a superficial reading of the oldest allusion to the battle, namely in Bæda's Ecclesiastical History,¹ has sometimes led to the supposition that the man who acted in that capacity was Brochvael, the only Welsh prince whose name he gives. What Bæda says, however, is, that very many priests, belonging mostly to the monastery of Bangor Iscoed, had come after a three days' fast to pray for success to their nation in the contest which was about to take place ; that the priests had soldiers to defend them a little apart in a secure place under the command of Brochvael ; that Æthelfrith, on hearing of this, resolved to begin by making an onslaught on the priests ; and that Brochvael and his men took to flight, when about 1,200 of the monks were slain, and only fifty escaped. This slaughter was afterwards regarded by the English as a judgment on the Kymry for having refused to join Augustine in Christianizing their nation ; he had some years before had a meeting on the borders of Wales with the bishops and learned men of the Kymry under the lead of Dunawd, or Dinoot as Bæda calls him. The pride and arrogance of Augustine filled with anger the men whose assistance he had come to seek. To return to Bæda, he tells us little about the battle which followed the massacre of the monks and Brochvael's flight; nor do we know whether the latter took any part in it. The historian, however, says that the Anglian king did not gain his victory without great losses to his own army; and the reason Brochvael was told off to guard the priests is not far to seek: he appears to have been lord of the country around Bangor as well as nearly connected with Dunawd, the abbot of it; and, seeing that his death is not recorded to have happened till the year 662, he may be supposed to have been hardly old and tried enough to have had the command of the whole army intrusted him in the presence of not a few princes, who probably were more experienced than he could well have been. The chief of these we have supposed Iago to have been, a view not discountenanced by the likelihood that his son Cadvan, who followed him as king of Gwynedd and died about the year 616, was also over-king of the Kymry. But even this, favoured though it be by Welsh tradition, cannot be said to be certain. It seems, however, to be the key to the flattering language of Cadvan's epitaph, which happens to be still existing at the Anglesey church of Llangadwaladr close to Aberffraw, where the kings of Gwynedd lived, probably from the time of Maelgwn. Llangadwaladr is thought to be so called from Cadvan's grandson Cadwaladr, who appears to have died in 664. The church was built by him, or in his honour, and the old letters of the inscription rudely cut on a rough piece of stone, have quite the appearance of being of the seventh century:

¹ Vol. i. p. 104.

¹ Book ii. chap. 2.

the words are—Catamanus rex sapientissimus opinatissimus omnium regum—King Cadvan, the most wise and renowned of all kings. Lastly as to Cadvan's son and successor Cadwallon, there is no room for doubt concerning the union of all the Kymry under his leadership in the closing struggle with the Angles of Northumbria; but we must revert to the battle of Chester.

Æthelfrith was at first king only of Bernicia; but, at the death of his kinsman Ælle of Deira, he succeeded in adding that to his own kingdom; and thus he became the first king of all Northumbria, while Ælle's young son Eadwine with his friends sought refuge in other lands, among which may be mentioned Gwynedd, where Welsh tradition speaks of him as being brought up for a time at the court of Cadvan in Mona.¹ There is probably some truth in this, and it is possible that it was the cause of Æthelfrith's expedition to Chester. At any rate, it is quite in keeping with his later conduct as described by Bæda; for Eadwine, according to this author, found refuge soon after the battle of Chester at the court of Rædwald, king of the East Angles, and Æthelfrith, hearing of it, offered gifts to Rædwald to compass Eadwine's death: he sent a second and a third time, adding the threat of war in case he persisted in turning a deaf ear to his wish. As Rædwald did not comply, Æthelfrith set out with an army to execute his threat. Rædwald and Eadwine met him and fought a battle in which the Northumbrian king fell, so that Eadwine succeeded him as king both of Deira and Bernicia: this took place in the year 617, or about four years after the battle of Chester. But, whatever may have been the cause, Æthelfrith's advantages were not vigorously followed up, although Bæda gives him the credit of being a most brave and ambitious prince, who harassed the Welsh more than any other English king, and seized on more of their country than any one before him: possibly the Kymry offered him some kind of submission, and promised no longer to harbour Eadwine. It was partly due, perhaps, to the losses suffered by the Anglian army, which were so serious that Bæda mentions them as great, and that Welsh tradition has construed them into a victory for the Kymry; it was owing partly, perhaps chiefly, to Æthelfrith's anxiety to be free to watch Eadwine's movements. The battle of Chester left the city desolate, never to be afterwards haunted by its Kymric dwellers, and it was probably the first time for the Kymry to find the whole force of the Angles north of the Humber arrayed against them; and, on the whole, the battle seems to have had the decisive character which it has of late been the fashion to ascribe to it. Something much more decisive, however, was shortly to follow: it was the succession of Eadwine to Æthelfrith's place as king of Northumbria. He is said to have subdued all the English princes to his rule except his father-in-law, the king of Kent; the Kymry suffered likewise from his power. Among the first of them were probably those of the small kingdoms of Loidis and Elmet, the former of which has left its name to the town of Leeds, and the latter to Barwick-in-Elmet and Sherburn-in-Elmet in the West Riding of Yorkshire. Their land was annexed to that of Deira, on the confines of which they lay; but Eadwine did not stop here, as we read in Bæda's history of his having conquered the islands of Man and Mona, the latter of which came thenceforth to be known in English as Anglesey, or the Isle of the Angles. This is significant, for Anglesey was, as it were, the home and stronghold of the kings of Gwynedd: in fact, both this circumstance and the utterances of Welsh tradition would lead one to suppose that the Kymry were for some time wholly at the mercy of the Northumbrian king, while Cadwallon, who appears to have succeeded his father Cadvan, about the same time that Eadwine attained to power, had at one period of his life to seek refuge in Ireland; but we have no sure indication as to the date of this event. The Northumbrian king, however, became Christian in 627, and was baptized by Paulinus, a bishop who followed the former's Christian queen, who was daughter to the king of Kent; and that prelate has usually the whole credit given him of converting the Northumbrians; but Nennius claims it for a Welshman named Rhun son of Urien, and the Welsh Chronicle assigns his efforts to the preceding year. So it may be supposed that the Kymry were during those years under the Northumbrian king's yoke, and that they joined in the work of converting his subjects to Christianity. Next, the Chronicle above mentioned speaks laconically of King Cadwallon being besieged or blockaded in the year 629, in the island of Glannog, now better known as Priestholm or Puffin Island, opposite Beaumaris on the coast of Anglesey. This was probably done by Eadwine's fleet, and it may be taken as possibly marking the close of the drama which ended with Cadwallon's escape to Dublin. Again Welsh tradition speaks of several battles fought by Eadwine, which we cannot date, one near the Conwy and one also on Digoll or the Long Mountain in Shropshire, a spot with which the Triads connect a fierce struggle known as one of the Three Discolourings of the Severn:¹ these engagements possibly took place before Cadwallon's flight. Lastly, Cadwallon returns² after a time to recover his power, and is introduced by Bæda as rebelling against Eadwine in conjunction with Penda, the pagan king of Mercia: a battle followed, in which Eadwine fell and his army was cut to pieces, in the year 633, at a place called Hethfeld and Meiceren in the Saxon and Welsh chronicles respectively: this spot is supposed to be Hatfield, in the neighbourhood of Doncaster. The year after, 634, Eadwine's son, Osric, then king of Deira, tried to besiege Cadwallon in the city of York, and was slain with his men in a sally made by the Kymry. Then all Northumbria was for a whole year under Cadwallon, who now killed Eanfrith, Æthel-frith's son, who had been in exile during Eadwine's reign, and had come back after his death to be king of Bernicia. This was followed by Eanfrith's brother, Oswald, collecting a force and giving Cadwallon battle, in which the former had a great victory at a place called Hefenfelth and Catscaul by Bæda and Nennius respectively. It was won near the Roman Wall and the present town of Hexham in 635, and both those writers and the Welsh Chronicle assert that Cadwallon then met with his death, though the more legendary traditions of the Welsh speak of him as living many years afterwards. Under his son and successor, Cadwaladr, the Kymry seem to have continued to act with Penda of Mercia against Northumbria, both kingdoms of which were now ruled by Oswald. This contest resulted in 642 in a battle, which proved Oswald's last, at a place called Maserfelth by Bæda, but Cocboy by Nennius and the Welsh Chronicle. Bernicia and Deira became again separate kingdoms, the former under Oswiu, a brother of Oswald, and the latter under Oswine, a cousin of Eadwine; but Oswiu got rid of Oswine by foul means and possessed himself of both kingdoms. He could, however, get no peace from Penda, who is said to have been bent on extirpating the Northumbrians; and according to Bæda he was offered royal ornaments and gifts innumerable by Oswiu, if he would go home and leave off harassing his people, while Nennius, in a somewhat confused account of this transaction goes further and would lead one to the following conclusions :—Penda and the kings of the Brythons had led a large army to the neighbourhood of the Firth of Forth against Oswiu, who seems to have had the Picts of that region then subject to him ; Oswiu found himself forced to withdraw into a town which Nennius calls Iudeu¹ (whereby he may have perhaps meant Edinburgh), and eventually to give up to Penda, as the price of peace, all the treasure and booty which he had there with him. This was distributed by the Mercian king among the kings of the Brythons, and Nennius gives us to understand that it was known in Welsh as Atbret Iudeu, or the restitution of Iudeu. But soon afterwards came the end, in the year 655, at the great battle of Winwæd, or, according to Nennius, the slaughter of Gai's Field, which would seem from its name to have been in the Pictish part of Manaw. There Penda is stated by Bæda to have had thirty legions under the command of most noted leaders ; but the result, nevertheless, was that they were defeated, and that Penda was slain then or soon after, for Oswiu is represented as now ending the war in the region of Loidis, after most of the princes helping Penda had fallen. According, however, to Nennius, the King of Gwynedd, whom he calls Cadavael, had escaped with his army by night, which may have been the cause of Penda's defeat, and which certainly gained for the Welsh prince the nickname of Cadavael Cadommedd, or the battle-seizer who battle declines. Who he was is not known, but it may be guessed that he was an interloper and a rival of Cadwaladr's; for the name Cadavael, which is not a common one, is found borne by a man said in one of the Triads¹ to have killed Iago, Cadwaladr's great-grandfather. He is not heard of after the war with Oswiu, and all that is known with tolerable certainty about Cadwaladr is that he died during a plague which raged in Britain in the year 664; still some of the Welsh legends represent him as not dying till the 20th day of April 689, at Rome, a date taken from what appears to be the true account of Ceadwalla, king of Wessex. After his victory, Oswiu grew in power and became ruler of the Mercians three years after Penda's death, as he also did of other English peoples towards the south of the island; not to mention that Bæda speaks of his subjecting the greater part of the nation of the Picts to the sway of the Angles. As regards the Kymry, their state in its older and wider sense had now practically come to an end after a history extending over more than two centuries.

¹ See the "Myv. Arch" (Gee's reprint), p. 393, triad 81.

¹ Skene's "Anc. Bks. of Wales," ii. p. 206.

² Gee's "Myv. Arch.," pp. 393 (triad 75), 397 (triad 41), 399 (triad 60): see also Skene's "Anc. Bks. of Wales," ii. pp. 277-9, 442.

¹ This was, originally, perhaps, Iuden, though there is no denying that it is Iudeu in the MSS. at the British Museum.

In the struggle between the Kymry and the Angles after the battle of Chester, the kings of Gwynedd, doubtless, considered that both their dignity and their power were at stake. These are spoken of in Welsh literature as the Crown of Britain; for the Dux Britanniarum had not only passed into the Gwledig of Britain, but the latter had come to be spoken of as king or monarch of Britain. This last title would seem to have begun to get into use before the middle of the sixth century, when Gildas described Maelgwn as insularis draco or the island dragon, the island being probably Britain, and not Mona, as is sometimes supposed; and here we have an early instance of the habit so common in Welsh poetry of calling a king or great leader a dragon, as when a mythical Gwledig of Lower Britain is always called Uthr Bendragon, or Uthr Head-dragon, the reputed father of King Arthur. The Welsh words are draig and dragon, which, like the English dragon, take us back to the Latin draco, draconis, a dragon, and these in their turn to the Augustan era of the Roman empire, when dragons¹ began to figure in purple on the standards of some of the legions and to be borne before military leaders: the custom then extended itself to the emperors in time of peace; and the Welsh words make it highly probable that the practice was among the Roman traditions cherished by the Kymric Gwledigs or over-kings, whom the bards sometimes styled *Kessarogion*² or Cæsarians, and men of Roman descent; nor have we to look elsewhere for the explanation of the fact that the Red Dragon, which figures in the story of Vortigern and Merlin, has always been the favourite flag of Wales. From the Maelgwn of Gildas we now come to Bæda's Cadwallon, whom that historian usually styles rex Brittonum, or king of the Brythons, though he once approaches the old technical title of the ducatus or leadership by speaking of him as Brettonum dux.¹ According to the legends put together by Geoffrey of Monmouth, this title was an important point in the dispute between Cadwallon and Eadwine: the latter is represented as demanding the former's permission to wear a diadem in the east of the island as Cadwallon was wont to do in the west, and to celebrate the great festivals as he did. These words contain an allusion to the fixed meetings at which the feudal lord received the homage of his men. There is probably some truth in Geoffrey's account, and it is in harmony with the fact that Eadwine solved the difficulty by driving Cadwallon out of Britain, and the latter in his turn by taking the government of Northumbria into his own hands for a while after Eadwine's death. It is also in a measure corroborated by Bæda's words about the seven English kings who exercised a sort of leadership beyond the limits of their own kingdoms. He draws no formal distinction between them, while an eighth is added to their number (in the person of Ecgybrht, the first king of all England) in the Saxon Chronicle, the manuscripts of which give them all the same title, whether it be Bretenanwealda or Brytenwealda, that is to say, Britain-wielder or ruler of Britain, or else Bretwalda,² which meant Briton-wielder, ruler of the

¹ See Gee's "Myvyrian Arch.," Triads iii. 48 (p. 405); also Triads i. 76, iii. 26 (pp. 393, 403).

¹ See the elaborate article and the copious references s. v. draco, in Ducange's Dic. (Paris, 1842).

² Skene's "Ancient Books of Wales," ii. p. 212.

¹ Bæda's "Hist. Ecc.," iii. chap. 1.

² Bretwalda is the form in the oldest MS., and its meaning is clearly seen in the longer Bretenanwealda: the latter part of this is anwealda, a lord, which is accordingly found applied

Brythons, or Brettonum Dux as Bæda once terms Cadwallon. The leadership, already mentioned, of the first four kings in Bæda's list was exercised in Lower Britain as a continuation, probably, of the office of the Gwledig who succeeded the Count of the Saxon Shore, and there is no reason to think that it was ever known as that of Bretwalda or Brytenwealda: it survives possibly in the functionary called the Warden of the Cinque Ports. But the title of Bretwalda was most likely an exclusively Northumbrian title assumed first by Eadwine after conquering the overking of the Kymry in the person of Cadwallon, and then by the other Northumbrian kings, Oswald and Oswiu. Here it may be remarked that in walda, wewalda, anwealda, we have early English words which happen to be of the same meaning and etymology as the Welsh gwledig, or wletic as it would probably be spoken in the seventh century, this makes it hard to avoid thinking that the English were in some measure guided in their choice of these terms by that which was to God; it was otherwise written anwalda, onwealda, &c. Nor is it to be severed from anweald or onweald, dominion, authority, power: see Sweet's "Anglo-Saxon Reader," pp. 4, 27, 120. But it does not follow that the scribes of the later MSS. were merely guessing the signification of the Bretwalda of the earlier MS., for they were not wholly without other sources—witness their Conmægl and Farinmægl, as compared with the much later forms in the oldest existing MS., and with Bæda's Brocmæilus. The explanations that aim at dissociating Bretten, Bryten, and Bret, from Britain and Britons, are forced, and dictated by the wish to keep clear of what is thought a historical difficulty.

in use among the Welsh. It is further worthy of note that Eadwine was the first English prince described as wont to have, according to Bæda's¹ account, a standard borne before him wherever he rode, as was the habit of the Cæsars of Rome, and probably also of the Cæsarians of the Kymry after them and their example; but what device Eadwine had on his, whether it was like theirs a red dragon or not, we have no means of finding out; nor can we stay to inquire whether the tuft carried before him when he was pleased to walk consisted of a triad of plumes used in the same way by the Gwledig, and to be regarded as forming a middle term between the insignia of office of the Dux Britanniarum and the Prince of Wales's Feathers.

The disgrace the Kymry felt at losing the Crown of Britain, whatever that somewhat indefinite expression implied, was probably nothing in comparison with their bitterness at being robbed of one piece after another of their country. We have already alluded to Eadwine annexing Loidis and Elmet to his own kingdom of Deira; but far more fatal to Kymric independence was the appropriation by the Angles of the district of Teyrnllwg, described by Welsh tradition² as reaching from the Dee to the forests of Cumberland and the neighbourhood of the Derwent, which was once the boundary of the diocese of Chester: the tract consisting of the level part of Cheshire and South Lancashire must have been taken from the Kymry soon after, possibly before, the battle of Chester. Their loss of the plains of Teyrnllwg cut their state in two, and everything was calculated to rouse them to the highest pitch of fury and to the utmost exertion to rid themselves of their encroaching neighbours, to both of which Welsh poetry abundantly testifies. The struggle, of which the bards continued to sing¹ long afterwards, was no longer a struggle for mere glory ; it had become an effort on the part of their race to expel the Angles from the country and to drive the Ellmyn or Allemans, as they were sometimes termed, bag and baggage into their ships in quest of another home. It is in the heated atmosphere of this period that one can realize how closely the parts of the Kymric state clung together, and what a cruel wrench it was felt to be when it was torn in two ; and it is only in the lurid light of this all but forgotten context that one can read what the Brython meant, who first found that name too vague and began to call himself a Kymro, that is to say, Cym-bro (Combrox) or compatriot, the native of the country, the rightful owner of the soil, which he thought it his duty to hold against the All-fro (Allobrox), as he called the invader who came from another land, the devastating foreigner with whose head the fierce muse of his time and race loved to behold him playing football. Neither was this fire of hostility towards the intruder confined to the Kymry, for it seems to have more than once been spread by them to the other Celts,¹ from whom the bards represent them as drawing active assistance—from the Brythons of Dumnonia and Armorica, from the Goidels of Dublin and Scotland; nor does it by any means appear improbable that all these peoples, excepting perhaps those of Armorica, were represented in the motley host led by Penda of Mercia to the North, when the curtain fell at the closing scene of Oswiu's victory and the Welsh leader's inglorious flight in 655.

¹ "Hist. Eccl.," ii. 16.

² Iolo MSS., p. 86.

¹ See for instance Skene's "Ancient Bks. of Wales," ii. pp. 123-9.

From that time, or rather from the occupation by the English of the plain of the Dee and the Mersey, the Kymry dwelt in two lands, known in quasi-Latin as Cambria, in Welsh Cymru, which denotes the Principality of Wales, and Cumbria or the kingdom of Cumberland; but for a considerable time previously their territory must have been considerably narrowed in the direction of those rivers, for even Ceawlin of Wessex had carried his conquests along the eastern bank of the Severn into the heart of what is now Shropshire, leaving on his right a peninsula of Kymric country, reaching probably to the Avon: this was afterwards acquired by the English tribes of Mercia as the result of many a minor struggle lost to history, though a careful study of place-names in that district might still perhaps enable one to form an idea of the spots where the old inhabitants were able to keep their ground. As to the country west of the Severn, the kings of Wessex appear to have made incursions into South

¹ See among others the poems in Skene's "Anc. Bks. of Wales," ii. pp. 205-13.

Wales from time to time, and gained, possibly, a permanent footing on the west bank of that river; but it was not till the time of Offa that the English frontier was materially advanced towards the west. He reigned over Mercia from 755 to 794, and made it the first power in Britain; besides his conflicts with the other English states, he had many wars with the Kymry west of the Severn, especially during the last twenty years of his reign. He encroached on them, and they retaliated by ravaging his country; so he had an earthen rampart drawn from the mouth of the Wye to the estuary of the Dee, to divide Mercia from Wales: thus he severed from the latter a very considerable tract of country, including a large part of Powys, with the important town of Pengwern, which became English with its name translated into Shrewsbury. Thus the southern Cambria shrank into the Wales of our day, in which we include the county of Monmouth, and, roughly speaking, Offa's Dyke is still regarded as the boundary between England and Wales, though few remains of it are now to be seen.

We have thus rapidly followed the southern Kymry into Wales, and we should now leave them, but that a word or two touching their history there may serve to give its full meaning to what we have already said about the nature of their state before Oswiu's victory. From that time very little is known of them for nearly a century, and it has therefore been supposed, that for a considerable portion of that interval they were under the domination of the English. But, when at length we read a little more about them, we find them still ruled by kings of the race of Maelgwn; and the Welsh Chronicle in recording, in the year 754, the death of Rhodri, grandson of Cadwaladr, styles him Rex Brittonum, or king of the Brythons. His son, Kynan, left a daughter only, who was married to Mervyn, said to have come, like Cunedda, from Manaw in the North. Mervyn became king of all Wales, and was followed by his son, Rhodri the Great, who was also king of all Wales, till his death in 877. Rhodri divided Wales between his three sons and made arrangements for the eldest to be over-king: and that dignity may possibly, even in the period of confusion which followed the death, in the year 948, of Rhodri's grandson, Howel the Good, have had charm enough to make "confusion worse confounded." What with the wars of the Welsh princes with the English, with the Danes, and with one another, the web of Kymric history after the Norman Conquest is not easy to disentangle; but the kingdom of the Welsh is sometimes spoken of as having finally fallen in 1090, when Rhys ab Tewdwr was slain in battle by the Normans, who seized on most of South Wales. In time it ceased to be the custom to speak of a Welsh leader, who rose above his peers, as king of the Brythons, or even king of all Wales, a title which made way for that of Prince of Wales. That was the case, for instance, when the death of Llewelyn, the last Prince of Wales in any sense descended from Maelgwn and Cunedda, opened the way for the King of England to juggle the title into his son's lap. But, to go back to an earlier and more interesting fact, not only did the bards continue for ages to sing the praises of the Welsh princes who protected them, in such terms as had ceased to be applicable from the time of Cadwaladr, but we meet with a curious relic of the same past state of things in the tenth century edition of the Welsh Laws, where they specify certain occasions on which the household bard of the King of Gwynedd was to sing before his hosts a lay of which the subject only is given: it was the significant one of the Monarchy of Britain,¹ the last indistinct echo of the long-forgotten office of the Dux Britanniarum.

We must now say a few words about the other Cambria or Cumbria, for in point of origin we have but one and the same word in both forms. Kambria was regularly used for Wales by such writers as Giraldus in the twelfth century, and Geoffrey somewhat earlier had found an eponymous hero called Kamber to account for it, just as he likewise had ready to his hand a Loctrinus² to explain Lloegr, the Welsh word for England south of the Humber, and Albanactus to be the ancestor of the Albanach, the Gaels of Alban or Celtic Scotland. But the fashion was not yet established of distinguishing between Cambria and Cumbria as we do. Thus St. Petroc, who was probably a native of Wales, is in one ancient life³ called a Cumber, according to another version, a Cimber. On the other hand Joceline,

¹ Vol. i. p. 34.

² This is the Lochrine of Milton's "Comus," which see.

³ See Capgrave's "Legenda Angliæ," p. 266; and the "Acta Sanct.," June 4, i. p. 400.

who wrote his Life of St. Kentigern in the twelfth century, speaks of the land of the Northern Kymry or Cumbria, as Cambria, and uses the adjectives Cambrensis and Cambrinus accordingly; and Æthelweard in his chronicle, written in Latin about the end of the tenth century, mentions the Northern Kymry under the name of Cumbri. So it may be supposed that both countries of the Kymry were for some time called Cambria and Cumbria indifferently, the Welsh word on which they are based being, as now written, Cymru, which denotes exclusively the Principality, and is there pronounced nearly as an Englishman would treat it if spelled Kumry. It is needless, therefore, to say that Cambria is a less correct form of the word than Cumbria, and that, in the language of the Saxon Chronicle, it became Cumerland or Cumberland, and also Cumbraland—the land, as it were, of the Cumbras, the Cumbri or Kymry. The latter consisted in the North of a considerable number of small tribes, many of the princes of which claimed descent from Coel or from a Roman ancestor, and among them some from the Maximus who succeeded for a time in possessing himself of the imperial throne of Rome. The relations in which the former usually stood to one another and to the Gwledig cannot clearly be made out, but their wars were mostly directed against the Angles of Bernicia, while Urien, Rhydderch, and others who warred with Hussa, king of Bernicia from 567 to 574, figure very conspicuously in old Welsh poetry; afterwards Urien and his sons are represented as also fighting with valour and varying success against Theodric, who reigned over Bernicia from 580 to 587. He was probably the devastator known in Welsh literature as the Flame-bringer.¹

Hitherto Carlisle had no doubt been far the most important town of these Northern Cumbrians ; but, in consequence of a great battle fought by their princes with one another in the year 573, that city found much of its importance shifted to a more northern point. The conflict took place at Arderydd, identified by some with the Knows of Arthuredd, on the banks of the Esk, about nine miles from Carlisle, and by others with Airdrie, in Lanark. The cause of the war is not evident, but the prince who issued victorious, with the aid probably of the Gwledig, was Rhydderch : he thereupon fixed his head-quarters on a rock in the Clyde, called in Welsh, Alclud, whence it was known to the English for a time as Alclyde, but the Goidels called it Dúnbrettan or the fortress of the Brythons, which has prevailed in the slightly modified form of Dumbarton. The fact that Rhydderch, after firmly establishing himself there, prevailed on Kentigern to return from Wales to take the primacy of that district as bishop of Glasgow, also contributed eventually in some measure to the importance of that part of Cumbria. For a long time after Oswiu's victory the Cumbrians, like the other Kymry, remained under English domination ; but at length, in the year 686 Oswiu's son, Ecgfrith, the king of Northumbria, was defeated and slain at Dún Nechtain, supposed to be Dunnichen in Forfarshire. The Angles only retained their power over the Picts of Galloway and the Cumbrians south of the Solway, together with the city of Carlisle, which Ecgfrith shortly before his death had given to St. Cuthberht, with some of the land around it. The Cumbrians north of the Solway became independent, and had kings of their own again, of whom one is recorded as dying in 694, and another in 722. But, the Picts of Galloway continuing under the yoke of the Northumbrians, the king of the latter managed in 750 to annex to Galloway the district adjoining it on the north and west, which was then a part of the land of the Cumbrians, though it may have long before belonged to the Picts. In the same year a war took place between the former and the Picts of Lothian, who suffered a defeat and lost their leader, Talargan, brother to the King of Alban, in a battle at a place called Mocetauc in the Welsh Chronicle, and supposed to be in the parish of Strathblane in the county of Stirling; but in 756 we read of the Picts and the Northumbrians joining, and pressing the Cumbrians sorely. Afterwards little is known of them (except that Alclyde was more than once destroyed by the Norsemen) until we come down to the end of the ninth century, when we meet with a Welsh tradition that the Cumbrians who refused to submit to the English were received by the King of Gwynedd into the part of North Wales lying between the Dee and the Clwyd, from which they are made to have driven out some English settlers who had established themselves there. How much truth there may be in this story is not evident, but it is open to the suspicion of being based to some extent on the false etymology which identifies the name of the Clwyd with that of the Clyde. It is needless to say that the latter, being Clôta in Roman times, and Clût in old Welsh, could only yield Clûd in later Welsh. Harassed and weakened on all sides, the Cumbrians ceased to have kings of their own race in the early part of the tenth century, when a Scottish line of princes established itself at Alclyde; and in 946 the kingdom was conquered by the English king Eadmund, who bestowed the whole of it from the neighbourhood of the Derwent to the Clyde on the Scottish king Maelcoluim or Malcolm, on condition that he should assist him by land and sea, the help anticipated being intended against the Danes. So Cumbria became what historians are pleased to call an appanage of the Scottish crown, which led to various complications between the English and Scots for a considerable time afterwards. Into these we cannot enter, and it will suffice to say that William the Red made the southern part of Cumbria, including the city of Carlisle, an earldom for one of his barons; and thus it came to pass that the name of Cumberland has ever since had its home on the English side of the border, while the northern portion, of which the basin of the Clyde formed such an important part, is spoken of in the Saxon Chronicle as that of the Strathclyde Welshmen. It may here be added that this last was still more closely joined to the Scottish crown when David became king in 1124 ; but its people, who formed a distinct battalion of Cumbrians and Teviotdale men in the Scotch army at the battle of the Standard in 1130, preserved their Kymric characteristics long afterwards. How late the Welsh language lingered between the Mersey and the Clyde we have, however, no means of discovering, but, to judge from a passage in the Welsh Triads, it may be surmised to have been spoken as late as the fourteenth century in the district of Carnoban,¹ wherever between Leeds and Dumbarton that may turn out to have been.

¹ See Skene's "Anc. Books of Wales," ii. pp. 189, 199.

¹ See Gee's "Myvyrian Archaeology," p. 401, Triad 7.

CHAPTER V.

THE PICTS AND THE SCOTS.

To the remarks made in the last chapter on the Picts of Galloway, we may add, that we read of the Brython, whom Bæda calls Nynias, labouring to convert them to Christianity about 412, and building a church dedicated to St. Martin, at a place called in the Saxon Chronicle Hwiterne, now Whitehorne or Whithern, in the south-eastern part of Wigtonshire. They were, as a rule, little disposed to be friendly towards their Brythonic neighbours, but they appear, nevertheless, to have taken part with them in the war against Oswiu, when, as the result of his triumph, they became subject to the Northumbrians, who proceeded to incorporate their country with their own kingdom. Nor did the defeat and death of Ecgrith in 686 enable them to free themselves; for the Northumbrians are found to have set up a bishopric at Whithern in 727, and Bæda speaks of a man, whose name was Pecthelm, acting as their bishop there in 731;¹ the bishopric, however, seems to have ended with another, whose name was Beadwolf, in the year 796 or thereabouts. This marks the beginning of a time when the hold of the Angles on Galloway grew feeble, and Northumbria itself fell into a state of considerable disorder and confusion. But Galloway and Northumbria remained connected, after a fashion, long afterwards—probably until the former was bestowed with Cumbria on the king of the Scots by the English king Eadmund. Not only did these Picts so far retain the individuality of their race as to be known by that name as late as the twelfth century, and to form a division of King David's army at the battle of the Standard, where they claimed the right of leading the van of his numerous hosts ; but there is no lack of evidence that they still clung, some four centuries later, to their Goidelic speech, which Scotch authors used to call Ersch or Irische, as they rightly identified it with the Celtic language of Ireland and the Highlands.

¹ "Hist. Eccl.," v. 23.

Allusion has also been made to the Picts on the south coast of the Frith of Forth, but a few words more must be devoted to them before we pass beyond the bounds of what was once Roman Britain. The whole seaboard from the Southern Wall to the Lammermoor Hills fell, as already mentioned, into the possession of the Angles, but the tract looking seaward from that range to where the Avon empties itself into the Forth or thereabouts, and commonly known as the Lothians, was occupied by a considerable mixture of races, as may be gathered from the place-names there. Thus the district north of the Lammermoors, forming the peninsula over against the county of Fife, would seem to have been Celtic, though it is not easy to say whether the Goidel or the Brython prevailed there :

apparently it was the former. But on the upper course of the northern Tyne, which drains this region parallel to the Lammermoor range, one comes to a place called Pencaithland, a name which is in part decidedly Brythonic. A little higher, however, the head-stream of the same Tyne is called Keith Water, not to mention the parish there called Keith-Humbie, which, together with Dalkeith, between the two Esks, shows that we have to do with a district not peopled by Brythons; but by whom? This is a difficult question, as will be seen from the following facts which have to be taken together:—The Keith and Caith mentioned cannot well be severed from other place-names into which they enter at various points in the east of Scotland from Keith Water to Caithness; among these are Inch Keith in the Frith of Forth, and Keith Inch at Peterhead, the most eastern point of Scotland; in the former, Keith is probably to be identified with the town in the middle of the Frith of Forth, called by Bæda Urbs Giudi; and it is, moreover, on record that the Irish formerly called the Frith of Forth, the sea of *Giudan*¹ or of the Giuds, to which may be added that the legendary son of the eponymous Cruithne or Pict representing Caithness is variously called Cait, Gatt, and Got, and that a Welsh form of another Pictish name here in point is given by Nennius as Iudeu: it is the name he gives the town to which Oswiu withdrew before Penda, though there is no need to suppose that Iudeu was the same place as Bæda's Giudi; and lastly we seem to have a trace of the same form in the Welsh Chronicle, sometimes termed Annales Cambriæ, when it calls Menevia or St. David's Moni Iudeorum. We need not here be troubled by the lost Ten Tribes of Israel, but it might be argued that under these names we have to do with Jutes, and it would be hard to prove the contrary; on the whole, however, it is more probable that we here meet again with the non-Celtic exiles from Munster. In that case the Pictish country reached at least from the upper course of the Tyne to the range of mountains called Pentland, which is, as already hinted, only a corruption of Pehmland. Following their direction towards the sea we reach what was once the stronghold of the Picts, namely, Edinburgh, which, owing to its conquest by Eadwine, had its name sometimes made into Edwinesburg. The inland boundary of this Pictish district is indicated by the Brythonic name, Peni-cuik, borne by a place on the upper course of the more northern of the two Esks. How far the Picts occupied the country beyond the Pentlands is not evident, but probably up to the river Almond at least. Beyond that we seem to reach a district which was in part Brythonic: thus the place where the northern wall ended on the Frith of Forth was known in Bæda's time by the Brythonic prototype of Penn-guawl, or, as Welshmen would now write it, Pen-Gwawl, that is, the Wall's End. That would be the name as it was probably pronounced in Welsh, with the modification usual in most of the Brythonic dialects of u or w into gu or gw; but Bæda says that the Picts called it Peanfahel, or, as it might perhaps be represented in a more modern spelling, Penn-vael. The latter also was substantially the same Brythonic name, but the Picts must have learnt it—and this is significant—from the Verturian Brythons of the opposite coast, in whose dialect w does not seem to have ever been made into gw. And the Pictish pronunciation so far prevailed as to prove the basis of the English name given by Bæda as Pennel-tun, or the Wall's End Town, which cannot well have been derived from the Welsh Penn-guawl. But by the time when certain of the manuscripts of Nennius were written a purely Goidelic form of the name had been arrived at in the form of Cennail, now written Kinneil. The non-Celtic Picts, when we find them coming southwards, seem to have been fast adopting the Celtic language of the Caledonians who acted with them; so the contest of languages in the maritime district south of the Forth came in time to be mainly between Goidelic and English, which no doubt found a footing there in the time of Eadwine. Nay, the reader should know that some believe it to have been firmly established on that coast as early as in Kent and that by a branch of the same Jutish people: we are, however, by no means sure that this has been satisfactorily made out.

¹ Reeves's "Culdees," p. 124.

When Eadwine became master of the stronghold of Edinburgh he probably did so only after reducing the whole country between the Lammermoors and the Avon, a conquest which may be supposed to have made his dominions continuous from the latter river to the Humber ; but when Penda and his Celtic allies appeared in the north most of the non-Anglian inhabitants of Lothian were probably induced to join them, so that Oswiu when he proved victorious not only reduced them under his power but extended his conquests to the country beyond the Forth, as the Picts there may have taken part with their kinsmen against him. But the yoke of the Angles must have been thrown off at the defeat of Ecgfrith in 685 ; after his time we read of battles between them and the Angles, and, among others, of one fought in the plain of Manaw in the year 710 or 711 : then a battle is mentioned as having been fought in 729 between the Picts from the north of the Forth and the Picts of Manaw : afterwards, little is known about the latter till the year 844, when the Goidelic element became supreme in the North. Now the battle on the plain of Manaw is specified to have been fought at a place between the rivers Avon and Carron : it serves in some measure to fix the position of the region called in Welsh the land of Manaw, and by the Goidels Manann, a name which survives in Slamannan Moor, in which the river Avon rises, in the county of Linlithgow, and also in Clackmannan, which shows that another piece of Manaw lay north of the Forth, both having probably been included in the territory of the people whom Ptolemy calls Dumnonii. Their country had two seabords, that of the Frith of Forth, and that of the Frith of Clyde or the Irish Sea, and a certain part of it came to be called by the Welsh the Manaw of the Gododin : these were the people whom Ptolemy called Otadini, and placed on the coast from the Firth of Forth to the confines of the land which he considered the Brigantes to have inhabited as their own. Before leaving this district south of the Forth, it may be mentioned that next to nothing is known of the relation in which the Picts of Lothian and of Galloway stood to their kinsmen in the north ; but an unidentified son of the eponymous Cruithne is called Fidach, a name doubtlessly representative of the people or region called in Welsh poetry Goddeu : it was possibly Lothian but more likely Galloway ; for we seem to detect a cognate of Fidach or Goddeu in the latter part of the name of Galloway as Latinized into Galweidia. This has usually been derived by main force from Gall-Gaedhel, the name which the Irish in later times gave the Picts of Galloway, whereby they meant to describe them as Goidels or Gaels who adhered or submitted to the Gall or the stranger who came on his piratic visits from Denmark or the fiords of Norway, rather than with any allusion, as it is supposed, to the Anglian stranger who ruled that district as a province of his own for a long time.

We must now go beyond the limits of what was once Roman Britain, and say something of the Picts who remained outside the Northern Wall ; but it will lead to somewhat less complication if we speak first very briefly of the Scots who settled in Britain. They took up their abode in Cantyre and the island of Islay, the part of Ireland from which they came being the nearest district to Cantyre and known as that of Dál-Riada. The migration began during the last years of the fifth century, under a prince called Fergus mac Erc; and it was not long before the new comers spread themselves over much of what is now known as the county of Argyle. They were then separated from the Picts north of the Forth by the great mountain chain which forms a part of the boundary of the west of Perthshire, and used to be termed Dorsum Britanniaë or Drumalban, which means the ridge of Britain or of Alban. But the king of the Picts, whose name was Brude Mac Maelchon, drove them back about the year 560 to Cantyre, and slew their king. The Scots were Christians, while the Picts ruled over by Brude were still pagans; and it is supposed that the mission of St. Columba to Brude's court had as one of its objects the bettering of the position of the Scots as against their powerful neighbours. Columba, who was connected with the royal family of the Dalriad Scots, came over from Ireland in the year 563, and made the islet of Iona, near the coast of the island of Mull, the home of himself and his followers shortly afterwards: he succeeded in converting Brude and his Pictish subjects to Christianity; but it does not seem to have prevented their further pressing the Scots, whom we read of as losing their king and many of his followers in a battle fought in Cantyre, in 574. St. Columba at this point interfered in the succession, and chose as king of the Scots a great-grandson of Fergus mac Erc, whose name was Aedan, and then he took him to Ireland to a meeting known as the Council of Drumcett, where he obtained the concession that the Dalriad Scots of Britain should no longer have to pay taxes or tribute to the mother state in Ireland, though they were to continue bound to take part in her hostings and expeditions. So Aedan became the first independent king of the Scots, and he appears to have strengthened his position by bringing a fresh colony back with him from Ireland, and we read of him and Baetan mac Cairill, king of the Dál-Fiatach¹ and over-king of Ulster, driving the English out of Manaw, the over-kingship of which is said by Irish tradition to have belonged to Baetan. He died in 581, and two years later Manaw was left by the Goidels, which seems to mean that the forces from Ireland left Aedan to carry on the contest alone with the English, that is to say, the Angles of Bernicia; so we read of him fighting a battle about this time in Manaw, though nothing is known about it, excepting that it ended in his favour. Next we learn from Adamnan, who wrote the biography of St. Columba in the seventh century, that Aedan fought a great battle in which several of his sons fell, in what he calls the war of the Míati;² this battle, in which Adamnan ascribes a dearly-bought victory to Aedan, is otherwise known as that of Circinn, which took place in 596: it helps to identify Magh-Girginn, or the plain of Circinn, the name of which was reduced to Moerne,

¹ Another warlike tribe of the north-eastern corner of Ireland, located in what is now the county of Down.

² Reeves's "Adamnan's Life of Columba," pp. 33, 36.

and Mernis or Mearns in Broad Scotch, with the territory of the ancient people of the Mæata: the Mearns are now roughly speaking represented by Kincardineshire. But later we find Aedan again helped by soldiers from Ireland under Maelumi, the son of Baetan, namely, at the great battle which was fought in 603, at a place called by Bæda¹ Degasstan, supposed by some to have been Dawstone near Jedburgh, and by others Dalston near Carlisle, if not Dawstone Rigg in Liddesdale. Aedan had a very large army, consisting of his Scots, the Picts of Manaw, and his allies from Ireland, and it is not improbable that the Brythons of Cumbria had readily joined him in a great struggle against the Angles, whose king was the aggressive Æthelfrith, of whom we have already spoken; but he obtained a complete victory over Aedan and his combined forces. Aedan died in 606; he was a Dalriad Scot, but something more, for he is traditionally said to have been the son of a daughter of Brychan, the ancestor of one of the three holy families of Welsh hagiology, who is supposed to have left his name to Brycheiniog or Brecknock. It is by no means clear what the object of all Aedan's wars may have been, but it would, perhaps, be not far wrong to assume that they were mainly directed against the Angles and the Picts beyond the Forth and Clyde. Aedan's sons took a more or less active part in the affairs of Ireland, and so did his grandson Domnall Brecc or the Freckled; but the latter also fought several battles in Britain. One of them took place in 634 at a place called Calitros, supposed to have been near the Avon: it was probably an unsuccessful attempt to drive the Angles back over the Pentlands. In 638 we read of Edinburgh being besieged and of another attempt made by Domnall, who was again defeated. On what terms he had hitherto been with the Brythons of Cumbria we do not know, but at that time a war took place between him and them, in which they were victorious, and he was slain in the upper part of the vale of the Carron. The kingdom of the Dalriad Scots of Argyle seems to have never flourished much after this time.

¹ "Hist. Eccl.," i. chap. 34.

As to the Picts or Picti, their name, referring as it does to the habit of colouring the body which prevailed among them after it had disappeared in most of the country under the Romans, was never, perhaps, distinctive of race, as Brythons and Goidels seem to have been sometimes included under it as well as the non-Celtic natives to whom the term probably most strictly applied at all times. So historians speak geographically of these peoples as northern and southern Picts, meaning by the latter the dwellers of the district stretching from the Forth to the neighbourhood of Aberdeen and drained by the Forth, the Tay, and the two northern Esks. Its inland boundary may be described as a sort of semi-circle of mountains, comprising the Mounth or that portion of the Grampians which runs across the country and ends near Stonehaven, on the north, and Drumalban on the west, beyond which dwelt those whom it has been customary to call the northern Picts, excepting that the Dalriad Scots had taken possession of a part of Argyle from the end of the fifth century: it is more accurate to speak of them as the Picts on this side of the mountains and those beyond them. Now, the former, in the loose sense here suggested, were partly Celtic and partly non-Celtic, while the Celtic element was of two kinds, Brythonic and Goidelic; for, when the earlier Celtic invaders, the Goidels, had presumably seized on the best portions of the island, their northern boundary on the eastern sea-board must have included most of the district drained by the Tay and the rivers that join it. A long time afterwards the other Celts—those of the Brythonic branch—came and drove the Goidels before them, as the latter had done with the aborigines. There is no evidence, however, that they had coasted beyond the Frith of Forth, though there is that they got possession of a good deal of country north of the river. The outlying tribes of the Dumnonii had pushed themselves as far as the skirts of the great Caledonian forest, and laid claim to most of the tract probably between the Forth and the Almond except the peninsular part of Fife. Ptolemy assigns to them three towns, namely, Alauna, which may have been at Ardoch near the Allan; Lindon, supposed to have been at Delginross, near Comrie, on the Earn; and Victoria, possibly situated at Strageath on the same river. These tribes were probably the Verturiones of ancient authors, and their name yielded that of the Men of Fortrenn of Pictish history, which makes Menteith, Strathearn, and Fothreve, or the western portion of Fife, parts of their kingdom. So situated, these Brythons had around them on the north and the east a zone of Goidelic territory, comprising the provinces of Athol in the Perthshire highlands, and Gowrie, together with the eastern part of Fife. The north-east corner of this Cismontane Pictland, the region of the twin Esks, belonged to those of the aboriginal Picts known as Mæatæ from the beginning of the third century down to the time of Adamnan in the seventh, who records practically the same name in the forms Miati and Miathi. Their country is mostly known in history as the Mearns, to which may be added probably most of the province of Angus. The two correspond pretty nearly to the counties of Forfar and Kincardine respectively. This land, from Stonehaven to Stirling, and from Drumalban to the North Sea, with its three contending races of Brythons, Goidels, and non-Celtic Picts, is the theatre where most of the known history of the Pictish kingdom was acted.

The Pictish kingdom, we said, for historians are wont to speak of it in the singular ; and, on the whole, the facts of the case warrant it, especially if the head of it be looked at as an Ard-ri or high-king, holding a position somewhat like the Gwledig among the Kymry. Moreover, the kingdom is rightly called Pictish, and not Goidelic or Brythonic ; but this leads us to the question as to its probable origin, and as to what became of the Caledonians, who were the most powerful people that Agricola and his legions met with in the north. Agricola found and fought the Caledonians on the banks of the Tay, and there, no doubt, they continued as the people of Athol and Gowrie in later times. But for some reason or other they seem to have not long afterwards lost their foremost position: possibly this began with the tremendous defeat the Roman general was able to inflict on them in the year 86, since it possibly gave a rival people that had not taken part in the war with the legions, or taken only a subordinate part, the start it wanted in the race for the foremost place in independent Britain. What people that was, we know from the subsequent history of Scotland. It was not the Boresti, or the Brythons between the Tay and Forth, for their country had most likely been over-run; and Agricola took hostages from them on his return from the banks of the Tay; but it was the aboriginal inhabitants, including those called Mæatæ in later ages, from the land of the Caledonians of the Tay basin to the Moray Frith. And on this point something may be learnt from Ptolemy's Geography, which was published about thirty-four years after the great defeat of the Caledonians in 86. Beyond the Dumnonii, whose outposts reached the neighbourhood of the northern Almond, and between the former and the Moray Frith he locates only three peoples, and of these far the most widely spread was that called by him Vacomagi. Their country, as far as can be made out from the data he supplies, extended from the river Ness to the upper course of the Dee and the Don, and from the Moray Frith into the heart of Perthshire. He gives them four towns : the first, called the Winged Camp, is supposed to have been on the promontory of Burghead on the south side of the Moray Frith ; the second, called Tuessis, near Boharm, on the Spey ; the third, called Tamea, on an island in the Tay called Inchtuthill ; and the fourth, called Banatia, at Buchanty, on the Almond. The most eastern point of Scotland is called by Ptolemy Tæxalon, and the people of that district were the Tæxali, the bulk of whose territory is represented by the modern county of Aberdeen : they had a town called Devana, which has been supposed to have stood in the strath of the Dee, near the Pass of Ballater, and close to Loch Daven. The rest of the eastern coast Ptolemy leaves to the people whom he calls Vernicomes or Venicōnes, and who were probably the Mæatæ of later authors : their country, at that time, would seem to have comprised Mearn, Angus, and the east of Fife ; while their town, called Orrea, appears to have been on the Fifeshire Eden, unless it was still more south, somewhere near the confluence of the Orr with the Leven, not very far from the Frith of Forth. In the main we take all those peoples to have been non-Celtic, but their territory would seem to have completely included that of the Caledonians whom Agricola fought on the banks of the Tay, with the exception, perhaps, of a part of Athol, which may still have belonged to them. Ptolemy makes the Caledonians extend across the island from the neighbourhood of Loch Long to the Beaully Frith, which was possibly a mistake on his part, the country they most likely occupied being one which reached from sea to sea, not, however, as he puts it, but from the neighbourhood of Loch Long to the Tay, and down its basin to the North Sea. If we accept his statement, however, that they reached to the Beaully Frith, we have to regard their territory in that district also as probably overlapped by the conquests of the Vacomagi soon after he wrote. The extension of the power of the Vacomagi, not only across the Tay, but to the Brythonic country on the west of it, together with that of the Vernicomae into Fife, was probably of recent date; in any case it only meant that the Goidelic and Brythonic peoples had come under the power of the more purely non-Celtic tribes beyond them, and not that they had been displaced by them, at least, to any considerable extent; for the later history of the Pictish kingdom compels us to regard the central region, especially the land of the Caledonians on the western banks of the Tay, as always occupied by the most Goidelic race in the North. Among the strategic points of prime importance which the Vacomagi would seem to have won from the latter, may be mentioned Dunkeld, rightly termed the gate of the Highlands. The ecclesiastical history of Dunkeld began comparatively late, but the fact by no means proves that it had not been considered a point of great importance from the earliest times. It could hardly, however, have got its present name if it had not once been in the possession of the Caledonians, since in its Gaelic form of Dúncelden or Dúnchallann it means the town or stronghold of the Calidones or Caledonians.

The non-Celtic tribes may have occupied a subordinate position in the league of the Caledonians against Agricola; but we have supposed them soon afterwards to have taken the lead, a view quite in keeping with what we read about them in 201, when the Mæatæ, not the Caledonians, threaten hostilities against the Roman province, with the Caledonians preparing to assist them, contrary to promises the latter had made to keep the peace. When the governor of the province, in consequence of failing to get the necessary reinforcements from the Continent, was obliged to buy peace from the intrepid northerners at a great price, it was with the Mæatæ he seems to have had to negotiate. This clearly suggests that they were then the leading power, and that they had ready access to the frontier of the province. The original strength of the independent aborigines no doubt lay in the country of the Mæatæ and the Tæxali, and the part of the land of the Vacomagi consisting of the district near the Moray Frith, which is still remarkable as one of the most fertile regions of Scotland. So we see several reasons why Severus, when he arrived in 208, bent on crushing the northern enemies of Rome, does not appear to have stayed his march until he had made his way through the Mæatæ and Tæxali to the shores of the Moray Frith, and why he then seems to have thought it necessary to return through the heart of the Vacomagi's territory.¹

¹ See Skene's "Celtic Scotland," i. p. 87, &c.

And when Constantius Chlorus marched beyond the Northern Wall, he is described by a Roman panegyrist as reaching the forests and swamps of the Caledonians and the other Picts ; for, though he may not have penetrated beyond the land of the Verturiones, these words were probably in a manner warranted by the Verturiones being then more or less subject to the Picts. Ammianus, however, writing of the irruption of the northern populations in 364, says that they were at that time divided into two peoples, the Verturiones, whom we have already found to have been Brythons, and the Dicalidonæ,¹ a name for the Caledonians and non-Celtic peoples acting together and treated as one power. The term, however, is as old at least as the time of Ptolemy, who used it, in an older form, as the basis of the adjective which he applies to the ocean on the west of Scotland, when he terms it Δουηκαληδόνιος, or, as it might perhaps be transcribed, Dwicalidionios. But, to return to the Verturian Brythons, it would seem that their country had not so completely fallen under the power of the non-Celtic races as that of the Caledonians, or the Goidels of the central part of Cismontane Pictland ; but the former had sufficient command of the whole country beyond the Forth to have had ready access to the Roman province. Some of their hordes came down from the direction of Dunkeld with many Caledonians among them, anxious to join in their plundering expeditions ; some came from the

¹ Amm. Marcell., xxvii. 8.

Mearns and from the land beyond the Mounth, and all met among the Verturian Brythons, who willingly joined them, no doubt, and then steered them clear of the end of the Roman Wall, the Brythonic name of which they taught them for the first time. And Gildas, though probably possessed of no close acquaintance with the geography of the northern part of the island, cannot be said to have inaptly described the Picts as a transmarine people, emerging from their coracles to attack the province from the north-east.¹ This would be about the time when the Romans left Britain to its fate: afterwards little or nothing is known about the Picts until the time of St. Columba in the sixth century, when the peoples of the north appear again, occupying the same position, politically speaking, with regard to one another as before, that is to say, the aboriginal race was still dominant. Bæda² tells us that they were ruled by a most powerful king, called Brude mac Maelchon, who was in the ninth year of his reign when Columba came over from Ireland, about the year 563. Adamnan, a successor of St. Columba and his biographer, gives us to understand that the saint, on finding at Brude's court the regulus of the Orkneys, whose hostages were in Brude's hands, asked the latter to commend to the protection of his vassal certain monks of his community, who were then on a voyage in the direction of those islands. So far of the extent northwards of Brude's dominion, which had its head-quarters at a place somewhere near the site of Inverness: southwards we know that it was too great for the Dalriad Scots of Cantyre to contend with, a circumstance which probably had a good deal to do from the first with Columba's mission to the king of the Picts. Then there remains Cismontane Pictland, from the Forth to the neighbourhood of Stonehaven. We are nowhere expressly told that this tract was under the government of Brude, but there is hardly room for doubt. The whole subsequent history of the Pictish kingdom implies it, and especially the fact that Gartnait, who succeeded Brude as king, and without a revolution as far as we know, fixed his head-quarters at a place on the Tay, which is supposed to have been Abernethy, whither Columba thought it expedient to follow him. Thus we seem to have to do with a kingdom which had not as yet one fixed capital, and, though the southern part was in the long run certain to win the preference, the fact, that the head-quarters of the king were once in the north, clearly proves that the course of conquest had not been from the Tay northwards rather than from the Ness towards the sunnier south. Further, there is a characteristic of the Pictish kingdom, which very clearly points in the direction of the Ness, in the neighbourhood of which it always existed, and where it was last heard of: we allude to the so-called Pictish succession, which was vested in the mother, while the father did, so to speak, not count. Among the results of the working of that custom, as observed in the history of the Transmontane Picts may be mentioned the fact, that the sons of the same woman succeeded one another, and that, when they failed, the sovereignty passed to the sons of a sister; also that no son of a previous king of the Picts is recorded to have ever been made king by them, but that his race on the father's side did not matter, there being among the kings whose names are preserved a Welshman and an Angle. Such a law can hardly be regarded as the result of any other than a low view of matrimony, which must have at one time prevailed among them, and of a backward state of society, in which a man's paternity was normally uncertain; in fact, it would appear to have been the natural growth of some such a system of polyandry as that so often alluded to by ancient authors, in various startling terms, as existing in Britain. In touching on this custom, we have already hinted that in all probability it can hardly have been Celtic, but that it is rather to be attributed to the descendants of the aborigines of the island. With regard to the Pictish succession this may be asserted with still more confidence; for it may even be doubted that it was at any time Aryan, while it is certain that outside the Pictish range there is in the Celtic world scarcely a trace of it known to the history either of Brythons or Goidels; and so strange did it appear to the Irish, that a legend had been invented by them to account for it some time before Bæda wrote his History, in which he speaks to the effect, that the Picts, having come in a few ships from Scythia without women, succeeded in persuading the Goidels to give them wives, on the condition that the Pictish succession should, in case of doubt, be vested in the mother rather than in the father.¹

¹ San-Marte's "Nennius and Gildas," p. 143

² "Hist. Eccl.," ii. chap. 4.

From the time of Brude mac Maelchon, who died in 584, down to the beginning of the eighth century, our knowledge of what passed in the Pictish kingdom is very slender and imperfect; and in the first place we are met by the difficulty which attaches to the history of the indefatigable Aedan, the Scot whom Columba had made king of his Dalriad people in Britain. On the whole it appears that he was bent on strengthening the power of the Dalriads by giving them the lead of the Celts opposed to the Angles, and in the next place by compelling the Picts to make concessions to them. This is probably the explanation of the fact, that he is recorded to have made an expedition to the Orkneys in 580 or 581, and also of his part in the war of the Miati, when he seems to have fought a battle in which he lost more than one of his sons and a great number of his men; it was that of Circin, in the Mearns, in 596. This was, it may be guessed, a struggle on the part of the Goidels of the Tay, together with, possibly, the Brythons of Fortrenn, against the domination of the non-Celtic Picts, and so it must have offered Aedan and his Scots an opportunity of dealing a blow at the power of the latter: he may, however, have been at the same time following up personal claims of his own, of which nothing is known, except that his presence in the Mearns looks like the first of the series of attempts which eventually made his descendants masters of the kingdom of the Picts. He died in 606, and peace seems to have prevailed for a long time afterwards between the Picts and the Dalriad Scots, of the former of whom we have nothing of importance to say till we come to the great victory of the Northumbrian Oswiu in 655. It is not improbable that they had joined the Celtic hosts who acted with Penda; so, when he was defeated and slain, we find Oswiu shortly afterwards making himself master of the greater part of the Picts, as Bæda tells us, meaning probably the inhabitants of Cismontane Pictland. In 672 the latter were aided in an attempt to throw off the Anglian yoke by a large force from the Picts north of them, but they did not succeed. The Picts then had for king a prince named Brude, son of Bile, who was on his father's side a Welshman from Alclyde, and we hear of him operating in the extreme north, where there would seem to have been a partial revolt: he besieged a stronghold in Caithness in 680, and devastated the Orkneys in 682. His activity had, however, not been confined to the north, as he laid siege to Dunnottar, in the Mearns, in 681, where he was probably engaged against the Angles; then we read of him meeting with success in Fortrenn in 683, when he appears termed king of the Brythons of that region. At length Ecgrith, who found the Picts assisted by the Dalriad Scots, and probably suspected that they derived aid from Ireland, sent an army thither, which cruelly ravaged the Irish coast from Dublin to Drogheda in 684, and in the following year he led his forces in person to the country of the Cismontane Picts. The result was the battle of Dún Nechtain, supposed to be Dunnichen in Forfarshire, in which he was slain with nearly all his men; so ended the Anglian rule over the region beyond the Forth. Brude lived till the year 693, and the next Pictish king of any note was Nechtan, who began to reign in 706, and forced the ecclesiastical affairs of his kingdom into great prominence. We left Columba among the Cismontane Picts, at the head-quarters of Gartnait, by whom he is said to have been so effectually supported as to silence all opposition among the tribes on the banks of the Tay.¹ What the nature of that opposition may have been we are not told; probably it arose not more from those who were still pagans than from men who mixed paganism with Christianity. In so far as the Goidelic and Goidelicizing people of that region were Christians at all, their religious ideas had been derived from the teaching of such previous missionaries as Nynias or Ninnian, who laboured also among the Picts of Galloway so early as the year 397; and even when Columba was busy among the Picts on the Tay his contemporary and friend, Kentigern, appears to have gone on a mission beyond the Mounth; and that Welsh missionaries had carried on work of a lasting nature among the Transmontane Picts is proved by a group of dedications in the upper valley of the Dee, among which are found Kentigern's own name and that of Ffinan, whose church in Anglesey is called Llanffinan, while that of his in Scotland gave its name to Lumphanan, a place of some note in Pictish history. As to Columba, his successors continued his work, and they had no doubt by the eighth century gained great influence in the kingdom; but it was a Scottish church under the rule of the abbots of Iona, and it probably succeeded to a considerably less degree among the Brythons of Fortrenn than in other parts of Cismontane Pictland, among the Goidelic populations. Of the latter, those who were most devoted to it were probably the people near the Tay, where the founder himself had laboured under royal protection. The Columban Church had also done a great work in Northumbria, but it had come to an end there in 664, when the Angles conformed to Rome. The same thing was now threatening it in Pictland under Nechtan.¹ He was at peace with the Angles of Northumbria, and, with their example before his eyes, he ordered the observance of Easter and the tonsure of the clergy to be regulated by the then practice of the Church of Rome. This took place in the year 710 at Scone, which is supposed to have by that time become the capital and the place of the coronation stone now at Westminster. The king had the assistance of Anglian priests to carry out the change, and the Columban clergy refusing to obey were expelled in 717, when they crossed Drumalban to the country of their Scottish kinsmen. It is highly probable, however, that they had many powerful friends among Nechtan's subjects who sympathized with them and began to oppose him. At any rate we find the king himself becoming a cleric in 724, possibly not altogether from choice, as he is found to have been succeeded by a king called Drust, who was supported by a party opposed to Nechtan. Both Nechtan and Drust were, we think, non-Celtic Picts; but the former seems to have derived his principal support from the country beyond the mountains, where the expulsion of the Columban clergy was perhaps less keenly felt, while the latter appears more identified with the Cismontane Picts of Angus and Mearn. The quarrel between the Picts is noteworthy as the prelude to the fall of the power of the aboriginal race in Cismontane Pictland, and the signal for the two Celtic peoples to compete for the succession.

¹ "Hist. Eccl.," i. 1.

¹ See O'Beirne Crowe's "Amra Coluimcille" (Dublin, 1871), pp. 29, 63, with Skene's remarks on the same in his "Celtic Scotland," ii. pp. 136, 137.

¹ As to this name it is to be remarked that it was in Welsh Neithon, written Naiton by Bæda; for it is characteristic of the mixture of races we have here to deal with, that the names of their kings are handed down to us sometimes in a Goidelic form, and sometimes in a Brythonic one.

The leading events in point were, briefly speaking, the following:¹—In 725, Nechtan's adherents took a son of Drust prisoner, which was avenged by Drust putting Nechtan in chains in the year following. Then came a revolution and drove Drust from his throne, which was seized by a king called Alpin, in ¹ We have in the main followed Mr. Skene in his "Celtic Scotland," vol. i. chaps. 6, 7, and part of the succeeding one.

Welsh, Elphin. On his father's side he was a great-grandson of Domnall Brecc, the grandson of Aedan, king of the Dalriad Scots of Argyle; but his name, which is possibly not Celtic, suggests that his mother was of the royal family of the Picts. At the same time that he ousted Drust, his brother Eochaid secured the throne of the Dalriad Scots for himself; but in Cismontane Pictland Nechtan again emerged into secular life to win back his throne, and the complication was aggravated by the appearance of another competitor for power in the person of Aengus or Angus, son of Fergus, or, as he was called by his Brythonic subjects, the Men of Fortrenn, Ungust son of Wurgust. He was undoubtedly a Brython, while Alpin may be surmised to have identified himself with the Caledonians or Goidelic peoples of the central part of Cismontane Pictland, and to have possessed whatever claims to power over them, if any, Aedan, the Dalriad Scot, had long before him. The first encounter happened in 728, between Ungust and Alpin, at a place not far from the meeting of the Earn and the Tay, where Ungust won the day and possession of the whole district west of the latter river. Alpin and his Goidels were afterwards totally defeated by Nechtan at Scone, when the latter found himself again king; but in 729 a battle took place between the hosts of Ungust and Nechtan, when the latter suffered so great a defeat that Ungust then became king of the Picts. The place where this happened being on the banks of a loch formed by the waters of the Spey indicates that Nechtan relied on the men of that district as his most faithful subjects. The next event was a battle between Ungust and Drust, in which Ungust was again victorious, and Drust killed. Then Ungust's son, Brude, defeated Talargan, son of Congus, one of the leaders of Alpin's party, and forced him to flee to the Scots in Argyle. But Dungal, king of the Dalriad Scots, happening to find Brude in a church on Tory Island, near the coast of Donegal, violated his sanctuary and made him prisoner, which drew on the Scots an invasion by Ungust, who put Talargan to death, and forced Dungal to flee, wounded, to Ireland. Two years later, in 736, Ungust devastated the whole country of the Scots, destroyed their capital, together with other places, and made several of their princes prisoners. Such were the straits to which the Scots were brought that Alpin, who had fought against Ungust and Nechtan in Pictland, was forced to lead the portion of the nation of the Scots of which he was the head, into the land of the Picts of Manaw, with a view probably of drawing Ungust away from Dalriada. But he was met by Talargan, brother to Ungust, at the head of the Men of Fortrenn and there defeated with a heavy loss to his forces, at a place near the Avon. It is not very clear what the exact object may have been of the course adopted by Alpin and his Scots in bursting forth into Manaw; but it has been supposed that Ungust, as king of the Picts beyond the Forth, had stirred the Picts of Manaw and Galloway to revolt against the Angles of Northumbria, whose king, Eadberht, is mentioned as engaged in war with the Picts in 740, when the king of Mercia took advantage of his absence to lay waste a part of his kingdom; so it may be that the Scots had been encouraged by the Northumbrians to invade Manaw by a promise of co-operating with them. After his defeat, Alpin was king of the Scots for four years, which brings us to 740, when, after leading his men into Galloway and completely devastating it, he there met with his death in the neighbourhood of Loch Ryan, in 741. Ungust then completed the crushing of the Scottish kingdom, and the country thenceforth formed a dependency of the Picts. The part of the Scots now seems to have devolved on the Cumbrians of Strathclyde, which appears to require as its explanation that we should suppose them to have previously arrayed themselves on the side of the Scots against the Picts and the Angles, who were now at one with the Picts. It may be that the Cumbrians had also received among them the remains of the army of the Dalriad Scots when they were finally dispersed, and that they found directed against them the power of Talargan, Ungust's brother, on the southern coast of the Frith of Forth. At any rate, we read of a battle in 744 between the Picts of Galloway and the Cumbrians; and the latter suffered from Ungust and Eadberht a combined attack which led, in 750, to the annexation to Galloway of a part of their territory and to a battle between the Cumbrians and the Picts of Manaw under the same leader who defeated Alpin, namely, Talargan, who seems to have been the king of those Picts. The Cumbrians had the best of it, and Talargan was killed; but in 756 the armies of Ungust and of the Angles made for Alclyde, and the Cumbrians had to submit to the yoke of the Angles. In the meantime those who had supported Nechtan seem to have been gathering strength in the north, and Ungust had to contend with a king, called Brude mac Maelchon, a namesake of Columba's contemporary, whose lineal representative, according to the Pictish law of succession, he may be supposed to have been, at the same time that he was probably the heir to Nechtan's claims; but he also was unsuccessful, and fell in a battle against Ungust, in the Mearns, in 752. The death of the latter is not recorded as taking place till the year 761, after a reign of about thirty years, in the course of which he had allowed the monastery of Cennrigmonaid or Kilrymont—that is to say, St. Andrew's—to be founded: the death of its first abbot is recorded under the year 747.

Ungust was succeeded by his brother Brude, king of Fortrenn, who died in the year 763. Then came Cinaeth, the son of Wredech, who had in 768 to give battle in Fortrenn to Aed Finn or the White: neither of them appears from his name to have been a Brython. Most likely Aed was a Dalriad Scot reviving the claims of Alpin, and trying to rebuild the kingdom of the Scots in Argyle; but he seems to have failed, and Cinaeth reigned over the Picts until his death in 775. He was followed by Alpin, who was probably his brother: the latter died in 780, and during his reign Aed Finn also died in the year 778. At the death of Alpin, Talargan, a son of Ungust, ascended the throne ; but this was in violation of the law of Pictish succession, which was probably foreign to the habits of the Brythons, to whom he belonged. So we find besides him another king, whose name was Drust, and whose strength presumably lay among the Transmontane Picts that clung to the female succession. He survived Talargan, who was slain in 782 and is described by one chronicler as king of the Picts this side of the Mounth. Drust, who probably reigned beyond it among the other Picts was undoubtedly not a Brython, and was succeeded by a man who seems to have been a Goidel—Conall, son of Tadg, who was attacked in 789, or the year after, by the Brythonic king of Fortrenn, whose name was Constantine son of Ungust. Constantine, succeeding, became king of the Picts, while Conall fled to Argyle, where he tried to establish himself ; but in 807 Constantine asserted his sway over that region ; and here it may be added that the hopes of restoring the Scottish kingdom of the Dalriads in Cantyre or Argyle had been fast vanishing : Fergus, the brother of Aed Finn, had died in 781, while three years later, in 784, the bones of the founders, the Sons of Erc, were carried away from Iona to be buried with those of the kings of Ulster at Taillten in Meath ; and now the Scandinavian pagans made their appearance on the coasts of the British Isles in 793, which was followed by such terrible devastation, that the Columban community of Iona, which was supreme over the Columban churches, both in Britain and Ireland, betook itself partly to Kells, in Meath, and partly to Dunkeld, on the Tay, where Constantine built a church for them. He died in 820, and was succeeded by his brother Ungust, who had ruled under him for some years over the province consisting of the old kingdom of the Dalriad Scots of Argyle. He died in 834, and was succeeded, in violation of the Pictish rule, by the son of a previous king, namely Drust, son of Constantine : so we find another king reigning at the same time with him, supported perhaps by the Transmontane Picts, as was usual with them in such cases : his name was Talargan son of Wthol. They reigned three years, but a competitor arose in the person of Alpin, a descendant probably of the previous Alpin and champion of the claims of the same house. He was victorious in a battle in 834, but before the end of the year he was defeated and slain ; and tradition localizes the contest in the Carse of Gowrie and Fife. After Drust and Talargan came Uven or Owen, son of Ungust, who had ruled for thirteen years over the Scots of Argyle. As he was the son of a previous king, he probably reigned only over the Cismontane Picts : this lasted only for three years, from 836 to 839 ; for now there came over the affairs of Pictland a great change, which was ushered in by the Danes, who had been engaged in plundering Leinster and parts of Ulster. They crossed to the north of Britain, and succeeded in giving the men of Fortrenn battle, in which the latter suffered a crushing defeat. The man who reaped the advantages of this expedition, and probably the one who had planned it, was the son of Alpin, the Scot defeated and slain in 834: his name was Cinaeth or Kenneth, and he is usually known as Kenneth mac Alpin. He followed up the defeat of the men of Fortrenn with such success that he soon became master of the Dalriad province in Argyle, where probably there were still many of his Scottish kinsmen, and after a few years' struggle he made himself king of the Picts. His first year is reckoned to have been 844; and he died in 860, leaving his family firmly established in possession of the kingdom.

One may say, that for more than one hundred years, beginning with the victory of Ungust in 728, no Goidel had before been able to possess himself for any great length of time of the kingdom of Scone, as that of the Picts is sometimes called; so that Kenneth's reign may be said to have commenced a new era, that of the supremacy, not so much of the Scots as of the Goidels generally, over the Brythonic populations and the aboriginal peoples of the country. The changes which accompanied this revolution were important—Kenneth completed, among other things, the reinstating of the Columban clergy. It had been begun by Constantine when he gave Dunkeld to the family of Iona, but now a church was built there for the relics of the founder, St. Columba; and the abbot of Dunkeld was placed at the head of the Northern Church. The first of that description, styled bishop of Fortrenn and abbot of Dunkeld, is recorded as dying in the year 865. All this had, no doubt, been well earned by the Columban clergy, as they may be supposed to have been active supporters of the cause of Kenneth's family from the time of the earlier Alpin to the former's triumph. Lastly, it may be mentioned, that, whereas the kings of Fortrenn, who were also over-kings of the Picts, had usually been on good terms with the Angles of Northumbria from the time Ungust made peace with Eadberht, Kenneth is described as repeatedly invading Saxony, which means the territory of the Angles, where he burned Dunbar and Melrose. As to his other wars, we read of the Brythons, probably the Cumbrians of Strathclyde, destroying Dunblane, and of the Danes devastating Pictland as far as Dunkeld. Before leaving this reign it may be added that writers of a subsequent period term Kenneth the first king of Scots who reigned over Pictland, and his father Alpin is likewise called by them king of Scots. So historians have set themselves the task of discovering whence the said Scots came, and have guessed that there was a general rising everywhere of the remains of the Dalriad Scots in favour of Kenneth. It must be readily granted that he was on the father's side a Dalriad Scot entitled to be king of the Scots in the narrower sense of the word, and that some of them were probably to be found both in their old territory and elsewhere, who may have readily joined him. But surely the Scots sought for, were always in the heart of Pictland on the banks of the Tay, the warmest adherents of the Columban Church, and the lineal descendants of the men who had undergone defeat with the earlier Alpin in 728. We hear of Kenneth and Alpin's Scots mostly because writers who used the Latin language called them Scotti. The proper rendering of that word, however, is Gaels or Goidels, and the chronicles not written in Latin call them such, as does also the Pictish chronicle, though written in Latin, when it speaks of Goedeli instead of Scotti, in mentioning the succession established by them in the person of Kenneth's brother.¹ The accession of this family means, in a word, the supremacy of the Caledonian Goidels over the other nations of Pictland, the Verturian Brythons, and the non-Celtic Picts, the former of whom now began rapidly to disappear, as a people, from history.

Kenneth was succeeded, not by his son, but by his brother Domnall or Donald, in accordance with the Celtic rule of succession known by the name of tanistry, whereby Kenneth's son came in only after his father's brother. The establishment of this custom is spoken of in the Pictish chronicle as first effected in the time of Donald, and it is referred to in the passage already mentioned, as the Rights and Laws the Kingdom of Aed, in allusion to the Dalriad Scot of that name who died in 778, after trying to set up the old kingdom of the Scots of Argyle. Donald's reign was a short one, as we find Constantine, son of Kenneth, beginning to reign in 863. Passing by quarrels with the Cumbrians, and struggles with the Norsemen, we find Constantine defeated by the Danes in a great battle in which he fell in the year 876, together with a great many of those who were most loyal to his house. He was succeeded by his brother Aed who died in 878, killed, it is said, by his own people, a statement which introduces a contest for the throne, in which the Brythonic element won again for a time a kind of victory. This took place in the person of Eochaid, son of Rhun, king of Alclyde, for the mother of Eochaid—his name is not recorded in its Brythonic form—was sister to Constantine and daughter to Kenneth ; but with him was associated, as his tutor and governor, a man whose name was Girg : it is given also as Girc, Grig, Girig, and Ciriic. Whether the latter ever filled the office of king tradition does not clearly state, but it is noteworthy that it connects him with the district of the Mearns, while Eochaid was probably supported by the Brythons of Fortrenn. Bernicia appears to have been now overrun by the Picts and the monastery of Lindisfarne plundered. Girg is said to have reannexed to the kingdom of Strathclyde the Cumbrian district south of the Solway, and also to have liberated the Picts of Galloway from the yoke of the Angles ; but none of these things are authenticated, though they may well have taken place at this time, as Northumbria, after Eadberht ceased to reign in 758, and his son and successor shortly fell at the hands of his own people, passed out of the power of Ida's family into confusion, which was afterwards grievously deepened by the Danes. As to the Pictish kingdom we seem to have now to do with a coalition against the dynasty of Kenneth mac Alpin; and the real relation in which Girg probably stood to Eochaid was that of a non-Celtic king of Mæatic descent, wielding the power of the Pictish nation, with Eochaid ruling among the Brythons of Fortrenn more or less subject to him. Lastly, these two kings of Pictland are represented as trying to strengthen their position by conciliating the Scottish Church, which they freed from the various exactions and services to which it had till then been liable. Even this, however, did not avail them against the Scottish, or, more accurately speaking, the Goidelic party, and they were expelled in 889, when Donald, son of Constantine, became king, and the succession was firmly re-established in the male line of Kenneth mac Alpin. Kenneth and his successors had hitherto been called kings of the Picts, while the country over which they ruled was the kingdom of Scone, or else the land of the Picts, for which a Latin name, Pictavia, was invented by the chroniclers; but in Donald's time, or not long after, this seems to have begun to get out of fashion; and we find one chronicle¹ in recording his death, which took place in the year 900, calling him king of Alban.

¹ Skene's "Chronicles of the Picts and Scots," p. 8.

The next king was Constantine, son of Aed, who was brother to Donald's father. He reigned forty years, during which he tried to consolidate his kingdom by putting the different churches on a footing of equality as to their privileges and rights, at the same time that an end was made of the supremacy of Dunkeld, while the bishop of Kilrymont or St. Andrew's came to be called the bishop of Alban. Now at length Constantine's subjects began to get some rest from the Norsemen and the Danes; but they were destined ere long to have to fight with the king of England; for as soon as Æthelstán, who began to reign in 925, found himself firmly established on his throne, he set about annexing Northumbria to his other provinces, and in 926 he got possession of Deira, whence he expelled the Danish prince who had the upper hand there. The latter sought the alliance of Constantine; but Æthelstán anticipated this by invading Alban by land and sea in the year 933, when his troops are said to have made their way as far north as Dunnottar in the Mearns and another place called Wერთոր, by which was probably meant the plain of Fortrenn. Thus they would seem to have ravaged two of the most important provinces of Alban; but three years later Constantine and his men, together with the Cumbrians and the Danes from different parts of Britain and Ireland, met in the north of England at a place called Brunnanburh, and fought a great battle with Æthelstán in 937, when they were utterly defeated by the English. Æthelstán died in 940, leaving his throne to his son Eadmund, and Constantine was succeeded in 942 by Maelcoluim or Malcolm, son of Donald. He began his reign by trying to assert his power over the peoples beyond the river Spey, where considerable portions of the country had long been subject to the Norsemen. But a more important event was yet to come: Northumbria had for some time been in the power of Danish princes who were kings of Dublin, and in the habit of deriving assistance from their kinsmen in Ireland. They had access to Northumbria through the country of the Cumbrians, who seem to have been only too willing to help them against the Angles, as were also probably the Picts of Galloway. So Eadmund harried Cumbria in 945, and gave it together with Galloway to Malcolm, on the understanding that he, who was connected by marriage with Anlaf Cuaran, the most irrepressible of the Danish Wickings who troubled the country at this time, should give assistance to the English by land and sea against the Danes. In 946 Eadmund was succeeded by Eadred, who proceeded to reduce Northumbria under his power; and, after various contests in that kingdom, we read of it accepting Eadred's rule in 954, who then made it an earldom. As to its extent towards the north, the Pictish Chronicle tells us, that, in the reign of Indulph over Alban, from 954 to 962, the English gave Edinburgh up to him, so that he now ruled as far south on the eastern side of the island as the Lothian river Esk. But, instead of one earldom of Northumbria, Bernicia was made soon after 966 into an earldom and Deira into another. Then Kenneth, son of Malcolm, who was king of Alban from 971 to 995, among the first things he did, invaded the more northern earldom as far as the confines of Deira: this he repeated the year after, carrying the earl away as his prisoner; and it has been asserted that Eadgar, the king of England, gave a great part of Bernicia to the king of Alban as a fief of his crown. But there is no proof, and the only fact which is tolerably clear is, that those northern kings who were in the habit of invading it, must have believed that they had some sort of hereditary right to it, the grounds of which are no longer known. In the year 1000 Æthelred, king of England, ravaged the country of the Cumbrians, but did not succeed in wresting them from the king of Alban; and we find them giving valuable aid to Malcolm, son of Kenneth, who reigned from 1005 to 1034, and continued his family's practice of invading Bernicia. This he did first in 1006, when he laid siege to Durham, and suffered a serious defeat. But now a great event occurred in the year 1014, to wit the battle of Clontarf, near Dublin, where the Danes of Ireland, and their allies from Britain and the smaller islands, met with a crushing defeat. Their power was considerably reduced in consequence not only in Ireland but in Britain also; and Malcolm was at length able to extend his sway towards the north and north-west of Scotland. In 1018 he succeeded, with the aid of the Cumbrians, in bringing to the field such a force for the invasion of Bernicia, that he gave battle to the Northumbrians at Carham, near the Tweed, and defeated them so completely that all the land of the Angles north of that river was ceded to him, and it became for the first time the boundary between England and the northern kingdom. For this province he is said to have done homage in 1031 to Cnut, the king of England. Malcolm died in 1034, and he was the last male descendant of Kenneth mac Alpin.

¹ The Annals of Inisfallen, Skene's "Chr. of the Picts and Scots," p. 169.

The kingdom then devolved on Donnchad or Duncan, the son of a daughter of Malcolm. He was an unfortunate prince, whose troubles began with an attempt by the earl of Bernicia to recover the district ceded by his predecessor to Duncan's grandfather, and by his invading Cumbria in the year 1038, which induced Duncan to lead a large army to lay siege to Durham, where he met with a disastrous defeat. He was still more unlucky beyond the Forth, where, however, next to nothing is known of his history. Since writers such as Simeon of Durham altogether ignore him as king of Alban, it may be doubted whether he ever possessed much real power there; he died, probably, in the attempt to acquire it, being slain in the year 1040 by Macbeth, the head of the Transmontane Picts, who bore the title of mórmaer or grand steward of Moray. As the latter is said to have been Duncan's general, it would seem that he had tried to conciliate him, and to attach to himself one who was practically independent of him. The circumstances under which Macbeth slew Duncan are unknown; but, as it appears to have happened at a place near Elgin, it may be regarded as the result of an attempt on Duncan's part to reduce him to submission: the result was that Macbeth mounted the throne of Alban and occupied it for no less than 17 years. For a long time the Norsemen had been in possession, not only of the Orkneys and Shetlands, but also of the north and west of the mainland : the most powerful of them at this time was one Thorfinn, who was on his mother's side, like Duncan, a grandson of Malcolm, from whom he had received the title of earl when he was very young. One of the first things Macbeth did was to try to force Thorfinn to pay tribute to him as king ; and an old Norse story called the Jarla Saga,¹ which makes no allusion to Duncan, but speaks of Macbeth as Karl Hundason, or Karl Hound's-Son, gives an account of the war which ensued. Not only did Macbeth's repeated attempts to conquer Thorfinn completely fail, but the latter carried the war into Moray, nor did he cease before he had cruelly ravaged the country as far as Fife, when Macbeth may be supposed to have been obliged to come to terms with him. The sagas magnify Thorfinn's power, and speak of his possessing no less than nine earldoms in Scotland ; but the details they give tend to show that he had nothing much to do afterwards with Macbeth's kingdom, at least until the latter wanted his aid, and that he settled down to the ordinary life of a Wicking, who spent his winters in the Orkneys, and his summers in harrying the western coast of England, together with Wales and Ireland. So not only did Thorfinn continue at peace with Macbeth, but he was induced by the latter to give him very valuable aid in resisting the attack which the party of Malcolm, son of Duncan, was preparing; the result was a great battle in 1054, but it fell short of dislodging Macbeth, who seems to have had the united support of the people of Alban, and it was only in 1057 that Malcolm, after having been in possession for some time of the country south of the Forth, was able to drive him over the Mounth and to slay him in battle at Lumphanan in Marr, or the district between the Dee and the Don. At Macbeth's death, the prince who should be mórmaer of Moray was set up as his successor, but he was killed after a few months by Malcolm at Essy in Strathbolgy, on the north-west boundary of the present county of Aberdeen.

¹ A critical edition of this and the other Orkney Sagas, prepared by Dr. Vigfusson for the Master of the Rolls, has been in type since 1875, but it is not yet published : thanks to the kindness of a friend, the author has had the use of the Norse text.

Macbeth was not of the family of Kenneth mac Alpin, but his wife was; for she belonged to a branch of it, the head of which it had been thought expedient by Duncan's grandfather to kill, lest he might some day stand in the former's way to the throne; and that Macbeth made the best of his wife's pedigree appears probable from the fact, that, in a grant¹ of land by him and his wife to the Church, they are respectively entitled king and queen of Scots. But the descent of Macbeth's wife, and the lack of all historical proofs that he was a worse tyrant than the other princes of his time, do not suffice to remove the difficulty which historians have found in understanding how an usurper was allowed to seat himself so readily and so firmly on Duncan's throne. This is, however, a difficulty which is in a great measure of their own creating, as Macbeth was not a mere usurper; and he himself probably considered that he inherited the right of Brude mac Maelchon and of Nechtan to the throne, a right which was even of older date than that of Kenneth mac Alpin. In the interval of nearly 200 years, from the beginning of Kenneth's reign to the death of Duncan, it is not improbable that the two Celtic races in Cismontane Alban had been rapidly amalgamating together: in fact, we read but little about the men of Fortrenn causing trouble to the kings of Alban after their great defeat by the Danes and Kenneth's accession; and it is remarkable that the crozier of St. Columba, which served the Goidels as their standard, is recorded to have been borne before the men of Fortrenn in a battle in which they prayed for his aid against the Danes in Strathearn and vanquished them. This was in the year 904, in the reign of that Constantine who undertook to put the churches of different origins on a footing of equality within his kingdom. By the time of Macbeth, the Goidels and Brythons of Alban might, perhaps, practically be treated all alike as Goidels. But not so the non-Celtic tribes; for, though the Transmontane Picts had been able to rule down to the Forth, the Celtic kings on the banks of the Tay were scarcely ever able to exercise much power beyond the mountain barriers, and, though the Goidelic language may have been steadily gaining ground among the nearest non-Celtic tribes, the process of amalgamating the two races must have been a comparatively slow and tedious one. This is fully borne out by what we read ; for every now and then we find the men of the Mearns acting as it were in the vanguard of the Transmontane Picts against the princes of the Kenneth dynasty who quartered themselves amongst them. Thus it was the former, probably, that put forward Girg in 878 and supported him ; then Donald, son of Constantine, fell at Dunsinnotar in their country, in the year 900, though we are not expressly told that they killed him ; but Malcolm, son of Donald, is distinctly stated in the Pictish Chronicle to have been slain by the men of the Mearns at Fetteresso, in their country, in 954. They had also probably something to do with the death of Kenneth, son of Malcolm, which took place at Fettercairn, in the Mearns, in 995, through the treachery, we are told, of Finnola, daughter of Cunchar, earl of the province of Angus : she is made to appear as the avenger of her only son, killed by Kenneth at Dunsinnan in the range of the Sidlaw Hills. Nor is it improbable that the men of the Mearns and the other Picts took a leading part in the wars of succession, of which we have glimpses in the year 997, when Constantine, son of Culen, was killed after he had reigned only three years ; and in 1004, when another king of Alban, Kenneth son of Dub, was slain. The chief of one branch of the Kenneth dynasty seems to have usually quartered himself in Fortrenn, while the other is repeatedly identified with the Mearns, which he most likely tried to treat as Fortrenn had been; but here the resistance was prolonged, probably owing to the aid the inhabitants derived from the Picts in their background. In what light the dominant race regarded both Fortrenn and the Mearns may be seen from certain Irish legends calling them its sword-land,¹ a term applied also in the Pictish Chronicle to the Mearns. At length we hear no more of the men of the latter district, but the antagonism probably continued between the people of Cismontane Alban and those beyond the Mounth: it was no doubt a much more languid antagonism, as the authority of the kings reigning over the former was seldom able to make itself appear much more than a name in the north, which may have required of the most powerful of the northern Picts that he should content himself with the title of mórmaer or grand steward. But several of Macbeth's immediate predecessors seem to have gone further, and to have claimed to be independent of the king reigning in Cismontane Alban: thus Finlaig, who was killed in 1020, is called by one chronicler king of Alban;² while another,² who died in 1029, is called so by another chronicler. Further, when Cnut received the homage of Malcolm, he obtained that also of the Wicking at the head of a petty kingdom in Argyle, and of a prince, whose name is given in the Saxon Chronicle as Mælbæthe or Mealbæaþe, which has been mended by some into Macbeth. If, however, it is to be altered, it is only into Maelbeth, a real name of the same class as the former, and borne probably by a predecessor of Macbeth's. But, whichever of the two he was, he appears to have regarded himself, and to have been regarded by the king of England, as independent of Malcolm; and his dominions may be supposed to have taken in all Transmontane Alban except a part of Argyle, and a portion of the north which was, together with the Orkneys, doubtless in the power of the Norsemen at that time. So, apart from the relations in which Macbeth personally stood to Duncan, and of which we know next to nothing, his becoming king in his stead was not so much an act of usurpation as a forcible assertion for a time, and that not a very short one either, of the supremacy of his people over those of Cismontane Alban. Of course the death of Macbeth and his unfortunate successor, Lulach, did not put an end to the aspirations of the northern Picts; for a time, it is true, we hear little of them, but in the reign of king David, Angus, the son of Lulach's daughter, who had, according to the Pictish law of succession, become mórmaer of Moray, made a formidable attempt to secure the throne of Scotland, though it ended in his defeat and death in the year 1130. Still later in the reign of David's grandson, Malcolm, we read of severe measures being taken in 1160 to reduce to quietness the people of Moray, and of grants of their lands being made by the king to the barons by whom he surrounded himself.

¹ "Registr. Prior. S. Andree," p. 114, Skene's "Celtic Scot," i. p. 406, and Reeves's "Culdees," pp. 125, 126.

¹ See Skene's "Chr. of the Picts and Scots," pp. 10, 319, 329.

² See the Annals of Ulster and Tigernach respectively in Skene's "Chr. of the Picts and Scots," pp. 368, 377.

The amalgamation already indicated of the Celtic peoples of Alban during the period of nearly two centuries from the accession of Kenneth mac Alpin to that of Macbeth must have added to the importance of the Goidelic element in the kingdom ; so its heads now began to have in Latin the title of king of Scotia and of rex Scottorum, that is to say, king of Goidels, though it is rendered oftener by the ambiguous phrase "king of Scots." This, it need hardly be said, had little to do with the connexion of Kenneth and his ancestors with the Dalriad Scots, as the fashion seems to have risen only in the tenth century, and was followed in the ensuing one, by Macbeth among others. But at the same time that the name Goidel extended itself to all the Celts of Cismontane Alban and the province of Dalriada in Argyle, the term Cruithni, or Picts, may be supposed to have gained in definiteness of meaning by becoming more closely identified with the Transmontane Picts, who probably had the most right to it from the first. To what extent Goidels had intermixed with these descendants of the neolithic inhabitants of Britain it is impossible to say ; nor is one as yet able to trace in Scotch topography the retreat, step by step, of their language, as it remains an unknown tongue. It is found, however, that in Columba's time there were men of rank on the mainland opposite the island of Skye, with whom he could not converse in Goidelic, as there were also peasants of the same description in the neighbourhood of king Brude's head-quarters near the river Ness, while there is no hint that the saint found any linguistic difficulty in making his way at that monarch's court. So it would seem that Goidelic was already asserting itself in that district, and that it was not very long ere it had made much progress in the region east of the Ness, though the aboriginal language may be supposed not to have died out of the country for some time after the Danes and the Norsemen began to plunder these islands. That the Goidelic idiom vigorously spread itself in all directions under the Kenneth dynasty might from the nature of the case be expected; and as against the Brythonic dialects this is amply borne out by the topography of Scotland. A few instances, some of which will bring us south of the Forth, will suffice to show the kind of evidence they afford. Thus Verturiones was probably the traditional form of a Brythonic word, but the later one of Fortrenn is Goidelic, and we do not even know what the later Brythonic form may have exactly been, though we seem to have traces of it in the Wertermorum, already cited from the pen of Simeon of Durham,¹ and possibly in the modern name of Auchterarder in Strathearn. Bæda, who records the Brythonic form of the name of the Forth terminus of the Northern Wall as being then Peanfahel, knows nothing of the purely Goidelic Kinneil attested later. Next may be mentioned the name of Kentigern, which would be pronounced by his kinsmen in his time Cunotigernos or the like, in the first part of which the Goidels discerned the word for hound and called the saint In Glas Chú or The Grey Hound ;¹ so though he was a Brython, and though the place he settled at finally was in the land of the Cumbrians, it is now known only by his Goidelic name of Glas Chú as Glasgow. Lastly may be mentioned the name of the river Nith, called in Ptolemy's Geography Novios, which, if Celtic, was the word for new in all the dialects ; but the Brythons treated it as Novios or Novijos, and eventually made it into the Welsh newydd, new ; and it is from some stage of this last that Nith was got ; but it could only happen through the medium of men who spoke Goidelic. In this instance they were probably the Picts of Galloway, but the same thing appears to have occurred north of the Forth in the name of a stream flowing into Largo Bay in Fifeshire, called Newburn, but which is said to have been formerly known as Nithbren.²

See the "Mon. Hist. Brit.," p. 686, C., and note l.

Thus far the triumph of the Goidelic element in the North : a word must now be said of its ultimate defeat and retreat to the Highlands. After the crown came again into the possession of Kenneth mac Alpin's descendants at Macbeth's death, it remained with them until the direct line became extinct by the death of the Maid of Norway in 1290, ¹ Pinkerton's "Vitæ Sanctorum Scotiæ," pp. 195-297.

² See Skene's "Celtic Scotland," i. p. 133.

when it proved the bone of contention between the king of England and the Norman barons connected in the female line with the house of Kenneth—we have said Norman barons, for the dynasty had long since become English, and surrounded itself with a host of Normans, Angles, and Flemings. This may be said to have begun when Malcolm married Margaret, sister of Eadgar Ætheling, the son and heir of the English king Eadmund, after he had been obliged to flee with his mother and sisters to Scotland in 1068. The southern influence went on increasing until the court in the time of David, who began to reign in 1124 after being educated in England in all the ways of the Normans, was filled with his Anglian and Norman vassals. He is accordingly regarded as the first wholly feudal king of Scotland, and the growth of feudalism continued at the expense of the power and position of the Celtic princes, who saw themselves snubbed and crowded out to make room for the king's barons, who had grants made to them of land here and there wherever it was worth having. The result was a deep-seated discontent, which every now and then burst into a flame of open revolt on the part of the rightful owners of the soil; and it smouldered long afterwards as the well-known hatred of the clans of the Highlands for the farmers of the Lowlands, of the Gael, as Sir Walter Scott puts it, for the stranger and the Saxon, who was regarded as having reft the native of the land which was his birth-right. It was doubtless the force that finally welded Celts and non-Celts together into one people, known to us in modern times as the Gaels of the Highlands and Islands of Scotland. As to the language, we read that when Margaret, in 1074, called a council to inquire into the abuses which had crept into the Church, Gaelic was the only language the clergy could speak, so that King Malcolm, her husband, acted as her interpreter. But the predominance of the Celtic element seems to have passed away with the reign of Donald Bán, who, though brother to Malcolm, allowed the Scots, when they made him king in 1093, to drive out all the English whom his brother had introduced; but after some intervals of power he was defeated in 1097 by Malcolm and Margaret's son, Eadgar, under whom, together with his brothers, the English element was much more than reinstated, as every encouragement was held forth by them and their feudal successors to Englishmen, Flemings, and Normans to settle in Scotland. At the time, however, of the War of Independence, Gaelic appears to have still reached down to Stirling and Perth, to the Ochil and Sidlaw Hills, while north of the Tay it had as yet yielded to English or Broad Scotch only a very narrow strip along the coast.

One of the lessons of this chapter is that the Goidel, where he owned a fairly fertile country, as in the neighbourhood of the Tay, showed that he was not wanting in genius for political organization; and the history of the kingdom of Scotland, as modelled by Kenneth mac Alpin and his descendants, warns us not to give ear to the spirit of race-weighing and race-damning criticism that jauntily discovers, in what it fancies the character of a nation, the reasons why the latter has not achieved results never fairly placed within its reach by the accidents either of geography or history. Considering, also, how little the general tenor of recent study has taught one to expect from the non-Aryan races of Europe, it is worth while recalling the testimony which history bears to the political capacity of the aboriginal inhabitants of Britain, in that part of it where they were able to hold their own; for the kingdom which Kenneth mac Alpin wrested from the Brythons of Fortrenn was, so far as can be gathered, neither Celtic nor Aryan in its origin. The trouble the non-Celtic Picts were able to give the Romans and the Romanizing Brythons has often been dilated upon by historians, who have seldom dwelt on the much more remarkable fact, that a power, with its head-quarters in the neighbourhood of the Ness, had been so organized as to make itself obeyed from the Orkneys to the Mull of Cantyre, and from Skye to the mouth of the Tay, as early as the middle of the sixth century. It is important to bear this in mind in connexion with the question, how far the earlier Celtic invaders of this country may have mixed with the ancient inhabitants, since it clearly shows that there was no such a gulf between them as would make it impossible or even difficult for them to amalgamate; and it may readily be supposed that the Goidelic race has been greatly modified in its character by its absorption of this ancient people of the Atlantic seaboard.

CHAPTER VI.

THE ETHNOLOGY OF EARLY BRITAIN.

THE most ancient name known to have been given this island is that of Albion. It occurs in a treatise respecting the world, which used to be ascribed to Aristotle, but is now regarded as the work of somebody who lived later. We then meet with it after a long interval in the Natural History written by Pliny, who died in the year 79; and he only remarks that Albion was the name given this country when all the islands of our group were called Britannæ; but it continued to be the habit of Greek writers, even long after his time, to treat Britain simply as one of a number of islands, to all of which they applied the adjective Britannic, or, according to their more accurate spelling, Brettanic. After Britain had been divided and sub-divided, by the Romans, they not unfrequently spoke of the province in the plural as Britannæ, but Pliny could not have had that in his mind. There is, however, another allusion to Britain which seems to carry us much further back, though it has usually been ill understood. It occurs in the story of the labours of Hercules, who, after securing the cows of Geryon, comes from Spain to Liguria, where he is attacked by two giants, whom he kills before making his way to Italy. Now, according to Pomponius Mela, the names of the giants were Albiona and Bergyon, which one may, without much hesitation, restore to the forms of Albion and Iberion, representing, undoubtedly, Britain and Ireland, the position of which in the sea is most appropriately symbolized by the story making them sons of Neptune or the sea-god. The geographical difficulty of bringing Albion and Liguria together is completely disposed of by the fact that Britain and Ireland were once thought by Greek and Latin writers to have been separated from Spain and Gaul by only a very narrow channel; not to mention that it is hardly known how far Liguria may have reached towards the west and north, or even whether the Loire—in Latin, Liger—may not have got that name as a Ligurian river: it is described by Vibius Sequester as dividing the Celts from the Aquitanians.¹ In some other allusions to this story nothing is found that can be made out to refer to Ireland, and in one of them the second giant is called Ligys, who doubtless represented the Ligurian race, while in some form or other the story can be traced as far back as the time of the Greek tragedian, Æschylus,² in the sixth century before the Christian era, though it is impossible to say when the names of the giants who attacked Hercules were introduced, or when they assumed the forms which may be guessed from the manuscripts of Mela. Even in the time of Pliny, Albion, as the name of the island, had fallen out of use with Latin authors ; but it was not so with the Greeks, or with the Celts themselves, at any rate those of the Goidelic branch ; for they are probably right who suppose that we have but the same word in the Irish and Scotch Gaelic Alba, genitive Alban, the kingdom of Alban or Scotland beyond the Forth. Albion would be a form of the name according to the Brythonic pronunciation of it, and between the latter and Alban there is precisely the same difference of vowel as one finds between the genitive of the Latin word oratio, prayer, namely orationis, and the orthan which the Irish made of it when they borrowed it into their own language. It would thus appear that the name Albion is one that has retreated to a corner of the island, to the whole of which it once applied ; and, if so, we ought to be able to indicate an intermediate point in this retreat, and we can : in a work associated with Cormac, a learned Irishman of the ninth century, the name Alban is found given to a part of Britain which extended to the Ictian Sea or the English Channel ;¹ nor does the author of it appear to have been the only Irish writer² who has spoken of Alban as reaching so far. Cormac goes on to specify that within his Alban were situated the town of Glastonbury and an unidentified fort of the Cornish Brythons. Thus it would seem that at the time he referred to, approximately the end of the Roman occupation, the name Alban meant all those portions of the west and north of Britain which his kinsmen, the Goidels of this island, had been wont to call their own. The name is, as far as we know, completely lost in the dialects of the Brythons, and it is probable that they were not the race that gave it to the island; it is more likely that they only learnt it from the Goidels whom they found in possession. It need hardly be added that its meaning is utterly unknown, in spite of guesses both new and old: possibly the word is not Celtic.

¹ See Elton's "Origins of English History," p. 25.

² It is met with in a fragment of the "Prometheus Unbound."

¹ "Cormac's Glossary," published in English by Stokes (Calcutta, 1868), s. v. Mug-éime, p. III.

² See the MS. of Duaid Mac Fírlis, quoted by Reeves in his Adamnan's Life of St. Columba, p. 145.

1 Next comes the question whence the name Britain is derived. This, together with the Welsh Brydain, is to be traced back to the Latin form, which was most commonly written Britannia; and this in its turn appears to have been created by the Romans, from whom the Greeks adopted it but slowly and sparingly, as they were content to go on speaking of this island as ἡ Βρετανική or the Brettanic. On the other hand Prydain, even when used for Brydain or Britain, is not to be regarded as etymologically connected with it, but rather as a variant of Prydyn, which will be brought under the reader's notice by and by. Its people were known to the Romans as Britanni, and this term it was that suggested the word Britannia to denote their country, which would seem to have come into existence not long before the time of Julius Cæsar, when Britain first began seriously to occupy the heads and arms of the Romans; at any rate, Cæsar was one of the first authors to make regular use of the term, though it occurs once in the writings of Diodorus Siculus, who lived in his time and that of Augustus, spending much of his life at Rome ; but he wrote in Greek, and in this matter he followed as a rule the custom of his countrymen, while we find Cicero, as well as his brother, who accompanied Cæsar to Britain, so freely using the word Britannia as to suggest that they knew of no other name for it. As we have thus traced Britain to the Latin Britannia, and the latter to the Latin name of the people, it will be asked what about that name itself? Its oldest form, as used by the Romans, was Britanni, which they regarded as belonging to the set Britannus, Britanna, Britannum, to which might be added Britannicus, and the like. Here the practical identity between the Latin and Greek forms makes it probable that it was from or through the Greeks of Marseilles that the Romans first heard of these islands. This is not all, for the Latin Britanni, and especially the Greek Βερραιῶν, have their exact counterpart in the Mediæval Irish plurals Bretain, genitive Bretan, which had at times to function as the name both of the Brythons and of the island. But it is to be noticed that neither Βερραική or Britanni, nor the Irish Bretain has anything corresponding to it in the dialects of the Brythons themselves. From whom, then, did the Greeks hear the word which served as the basis of their names for Britain and its people? It cannot have been from the Brythonic peoples of the south-east of the island, or any, perhaps, of the Gauls of the Continent: it was probably from the natives of the south-west who brought their tin to market, and in whose country the only Celtic speech in use was as yet Goidelic. But, while the earliest allusions of the ancients to Britain take us back near the time of Pytheas, there is no evidence of any direct communication existing then, or for a long time afterwards, between Dumnonia and the Continent. This brings us to the conclusion already stated, that the people of the south-west conveyed their tin eastwards to some point on the coast, to be there sold to foreign merchants ; the latter were probably, in the main, Greek traders from Marseilles. When, however, the Romans came to Britain they learnt the name which the Brythons gave themselves in the south-east of the island, and this was not Britanni or Brettani, but Brittōnes, singular Britto. It is the name which all the Celts who have spoken a Brythonic language in later times own in common ; among the Kymry it becomes Brython, which is one of the names they still give themselves, and from which they derive the word Brythoneg, one of their names for the Welsh language. This, in old Cornish, was Brethonec, and meant the Brythonic dialect of Wales and Cornwall after Goidelic had been chased away, while in Breton the word assumes the form Brezonek, and means the Brythonic language spoken in Lesser Britain. So, when one wants to speak collectively of this linguistic group of Celts from the Clyde to the neighbourhood of the Loire, confusion is best avoided by calling them by some such name as Brythons and Brythonic, leaving the words Britain, British, and Britannic for other uses, brought their tin to market, and the only Celtic speech in use was that of the while the earliest allusions to it take us back near the line of evidence of any direct or for a long time after and the Continent. The already stated, the man veiled their to be there with a probably, in the scilles. When they of they least the most selves in the refer- nor. Ethelred or body already Ethelred. It is however, who spoken a English will at once presented in Old nothing to do with so far as we know, the be of the same origin tables brethyn, cloth, and script of the ninth century Welsh form brith,¹ which and as it there enters apbrith, and occurs as a tabula, meaning a baby's lar implied must have ed by Stokes in the "Transac- or 1860-1861," p. 210, and in including among them the exigencies of the Englishman, who, in his more playful moods, condescends to call himself a Briton. The traditional Latin spelling of the earlier name seems to have been incontestably Britanni, while both the Brythonic and the Goidelic forms prove beyond doubt that it was etymologically entitled to the tt allowed the other form Brittones, though some editors are pleased to treat this as Britones, for which there seems to be no special reason but their own perversity ; for Brittones occurs often enough spelt so in ancient manuscripts, and usually so in inscriptions. The word appears first used in Roman literature by Juvenal and Martial ; but the more the Romans became familiar with Britain and its leading Celtic peoples the more the form Brittones may be said to have gained on that of Britanni, and it seems to have reacted on the spelling of the latter and the kindred word Britannia, which began to be not unfrequently written with tt in the time of Commodus. This continued on the coins of that emperor and his successors until the victory over Britain ceased to be commemorated by such means in the time of Carausius, whose coins in consequence give us no information on this point. A rare medallion¹ of Commodus goes so far as to give us the theoretically correct spelling, Brittania, with the consonants as given by Greek writers ; but the change of spelling is probably not to be ascribed to their example so much as to the analogy of the synonymous Brittones. Then from the writings of such men as Bæda, Nennius, and the chroniclers, the form Britanni may be said to have been driven out by that of Brittones: of the two the latter alone can in any sense have been regarded by them as a living word, the other having passed away with the Roman occupation and the Roman empire.

¹ There is one, we believe, in the British Museum, and Mr. John Evans possesses another, which he has kindly allowed the author to inspect.

So much as to the spelling and the history of these words, but what did they originally mean? The usual way to explain them is to suppose them of the same origin as the Welsh brith, spotted, parti-coloured, feminine braith, and to find in them a reference to the painting or tattooing the body already alluded to more than once. Any one, however, who knows the elements of Celtic phonology will at once see that brith and braith, which are represented in Old Irish by mrecht or brecht, can have nothing to do with Brython or the related forms. So far as we know, the only Celtic words which can be of the same origin with them are the Welsh vocables brethyn, cloth, and its congeners. In a manuscript of the ninth century we meet with the simpler Welsh form brith,¹ which would now be written bryth, and as it there enters into the plural compound mapbrith, and occurs as a gloss on the Latin word cunabula, meaning a baby's swaddling-clothes, the singular implied must have been either breth or brath. The connexion may be seen still more clearly on Irish ground, where bratt or brat means a cloth, a cloak, or a sail, and brattán, a little cloak, while from the former a derivative bretnais was formed, which, in Cormac's time, had two distinct meanings: when the root-word was taken simply as relating to cloth or clothing, bretnais meant a thing connected with clothing—namely, a brooch;¹ but when it referred to the national name of the Brythons it meant a thing connected with them—namely, their language,² which, in the case Cormac was speaking of, happened to be the Brythonic tongue of the people of Cornwall in his time. It would, then, appear that the word Brython and its congeners meant a clothed or cloth-clad people. But a national name of such a nature would have little meaning unless they had lived some time or other near another people that wore little or no clothing, or else clothing of a very different material and make. If, then, the first people called Brittones could be regarded as the first Celtic invaders of Britain, the name might be regarded as meant to distinguish them from the neolithic natives whom they found in possession, and whose clothing may have consisted of the skins of the animals they killed; but as no Goidels, in the linguistic sense of the word, are found to have been called Brittones either by themselves or by the other Celts within historical times, there is no reason why

¹ See the Welsh glosses published by Stokes in the "Transactions of the Philological Society for 1860-1861," p. 210, and in Kuhn's "Beiträge," iv. p. 393.

¹ Stokes's "Cormac," s. v. "Mug-éime," p. III.

² It may, however, be that bretnais in this sense is a compound meaning, a dress-fastening or the like.

the name should not be treated as exclusively belonging in Britain to the non-Goidelic branch of the Celts of the second invasion. Who, then, were the people whom the Brythons did not consider cloth-clad or properly clothed? They could hardly have been Celts of any kind, as the art of making cloth of some sort was known even to the earliest of them who ever landed here. In fact, the words we have cited supply the proof, and it would have been worth our while, had space allowed of it, to show how original Aryan gv or gw, a partly labial combination, yields the simple labial b in the Celtic languages; how it is simplified, with the guttural hardened to c or k, in the Teutonic ones, which allows us to equate Irish bó with English cow, and to regard the old Welsh brith alluded to and the Irish bratt as etymologically one and the same vocable with their familiar English equivalent cloth, the German kleid, cloth, a garment, and the old Norse klæði, of much the same meaning; and how the last-mentioned language possessed in a genitive plural klæðna the same kind of derivative as the Welsh brethyn. One might then widen the circle of comparison and introduce the old Irish word bréit, a strip of any woollen cloth, a kerchief, which implies, according to the ascertained course of phonetic decay in Goidelic speech, an older form, brenti; and both the latter and bratt have their equivalents in the Sanskrit group of words connected with the verb grath or granth, to tie or to wind up, which, as it falls decidedly short of the more developed idea of weaving, strikingly suggests that the Aryan nations wandering westwards did not simply carry with them the civilisation they had acquired in the far East, but that they proceeded to improve it. So among the useful arts practised by Celts and Teutons long before any of them had reached the shores of the Atlantic was that of weaving, however rude it may have been. On the whole, the race with which the Brythons contrasted themselves to their own satisfaction, when they began to give themselves that name, were probably some of the aboriginal tribes whose home they invaded on the Continent; for there are reasons to think that the name belonged to the Brythons before they came to this country. In other words, remnants of that people are supposed to show traces of their existence in Gaul in historical times. Thus Pliny speaks of Continental Britanni who seem to have lived near the Rhine and the North Sea, and it is thought that most or all of the regiments termed Brittones in the Roman army in Britain were natives of Gaul.¹ Further, Procopius, a Greek writer of the sixth century, gives a very fabulous account of an island called Brittia, which he distinguishes from Britannia. One² of the last writers on this difficult subject identifies Brittia with Jutland, and supposes Brittones from beyond the Rhine to have shared in the advance of the Teutons on Gaul, and to have settled in Brittany. That is doubtful, but it is a fact, though never noticed, that Brittia must have been a real name, as it is exactly the form which would result in that which is the actual Breton name of Brittany—namely Breiz : this last is the shortest, and cannot be derived from any known form of the kindred name of our country or of its people, which tells not a little against the tradition that Brittany was colonized by fugitive Brythons from here ; not to mention the fact that there is some difficulty as to whence those fugitives could have come, seeing that if they set out from the nearest parts of this country, that is, from Cornwall or Devon, they would most likely have been Goidels, so that the language of the Bretons would now probably be a Goidelic dialect, and not the purely Brythonic speech it is. This view would give Breton an importance never yet attached to it. ¹

¹ See "Das Römische Heer" by Hübner, Hermes, xvi.; also M. de Vit's communication in the "Bullett. dell'Inst. di Corrisp. Arch." (Rome), for 1867, p. 39.

² M. de Vit in the paper already referred to.

The soundest division which can be made of the Celtic family rests on an accident of Celtic phonology. It is that of the change of qu or qv into p, which is found to have taken place in some of the Celtic languages, but not in all, at the same time that it is known in languages other than Celtic. Thus, while Latin retained the older complex in the words quinque, five, and equus, a horse, the Greeks differed among themselves, some saying πέμπε for five, and some πέντε, some ἵππος for a horse, and some ἵκκος ; so while the Romans said quatuor, four, and quum or quom, when, some of the other Italians said petur and pon. The Celts differed in much the same way, since all the Brythons, whether Welshmen or Bretons, agree in using p (liable to be softened into b), as did the Gauls also, as far back as we can trace them, in all their names excepting a few like Sequani and Sequana; while, on the other hand, the Goidels, whether in Ireland, Man, or Scotland never made qv into p, but simplified it in another way by dropping the v, and making q into c (liable to be modified into the guttural spirant ch): this took place in the sixth or the seventh century. In the old Ogam inscriptions of Ireland the qv is represented by a symbol of its own, and not only there, but in those of Wales, Cornwall, and Devon. Thus on both sides of St. George's Channel the most important key-word which the ancient epitaphs supply us with is magvi, the genitive of the word which has yielded the Goidels of the present day their mac, a son, and has taken in Welsh the form māb (for an older map) of the same meaning. The inscriptions in question from Wales and Dumnonia may, roughly speaking, be assigned to the sixth century, though some of them may be of the fifth and some of the seventh; but the remarkable point about them is, that the little Celtic which they yield us usually agrees both in the matter of the qv and in other respects, with the language of the Goidels rather than with Gaulish, with Welsh, Old Cornish, or Breton. Who, then, were the Celts, of whose language the epitaphs in question give us a few samples? The question has been variously answered: some would say that they were invaders from Ireland, the Scots, in fact, who made descents on the coast of Britain about the end of the Roman occupation and afterwards ; but the evidence to that effect is not yet abundant, while the fact, that the Romans had not even a single company of soldiers to defend either Wales or Cornwall, is significant. Some would say that they were the ancestors of the Welsh and of the Celts of Cornwall and Devon, and that their language was an early form of what has since become known as Welsh and Cornish : that is to say, the Celtic of the Ogam inscriptions in the course of time underwent changes which shaped it into the dialects we call Welsh and Old Cornish. This was till lately the view taken by the author, but a more thorough understanding of the inscriptions, together with additional information, has forced him to give it up in favour of the following, namely, that the Celts who spoke the language of the Celtic epitaphs were, in part, the ancestors of the Welsh and Cornish peoples, and that they have since changed their language from a Goidelic to a Brythonic one. In other words, they were Goidels belonging to the first Celtic invasion of Britain, of whom some passed over into Ireland, and made that island also Celtic. At that point, or still earlier, all the British Islands may be treated as Goidelic, excepting certain parts where the neolithic natives may have been able to make a stand against the Goidels ; but at some later period there arrived another Celtic people, with another Celtic language, which was probably to all intents and purposes the same as that of the Gauls. These later invaders called themselves Brittones, and seized on the best portions of Britain, driving the Goidelic

Celts before them to the west and north of the island; and it is the monuments of these retreating Goidels of Britain that we have, for the most part at any rate, in the old inscriptions, and not those of Goidelic invaders from Ireland. It is true, however, that their Goidelic idiom, which was at length supplanted by the ever-encroaching dialects of the Brythons, was, practically, the same language as that of the Celts of Ireland, of Man, and of Scotland, so that we are left without any means of distinguishing in point of speech between the ancient inhabitants and their invading kinsmen from the sister island.

We shall now try roughly to show what portions of the island were occupied by the Brythonic and the Goidelic Celts respectively, about the beginning, say, of the Roman occupation. Setting out from the Isle of Wight, we find that the Dumnoni of Devon and Cornwall are proved by their epitaphs¹ after the Roman occupation to have been Goidels, in so far as they were Celts at all, for in point of blood they consisted largely, perhaps, of the non-Celtic natives, and the language of the latter can hardly have died out in the district near the Land's End at the time when it got its name of Belerion, which Ptolemy gives it; since it is possibly not an accident that Belerion is an early form which might yield, in old Irish, bélre, later bérta. This is the word the Irish employ for language, usually a language not their own, and particularly the English tongue.

¹ See Hübner's "Inscr. Brit. Christ.," Nos. 3, 17, 24, 25, 26.

But as to the Durotriges, to the east of the mixed people of Dumnonia, it is difficult to determine their nationality. On the whole, however, they also seem to have been Goidels, a conclusion suggested, among other things, by the name of their town, Dunion, which differs from the Gaulish dūnon, Welsh din, a town or fortress, just where it comes near its Irish equivalent dūn, genitive dūne. In that case no part of the country west of the Dorsetshire Stour and the Parret is presumably to be regarded as Brythonic. North of the Bristol Channel, the Severn and its tributary the Teme probably formed the boundary, the country within those rivers being divided between the Silures, who had the south-east, and the Demetæ, who had the south-west. Both these peoples may, like other Goidelic states, have, to a certain extent, absorbed an earlier, non-Celtic, neolithic population; but as against the Brythons we must treat them in point of language as Goidelic, and leave the question of origin mainly to those who study skins and skulls. The rest of what is now the Principality of Wales, together with the portion of the West of England adjoining, is usually supposed to have been occupied by the Ordovices; but this powerful people, which we assume to have been Brythonic, overshadowed a Goidelic population occupying the north-west corner of the Principality, including Mona and the mainland within the Clwyd, the Dee, and the Mawddach, which reaches the sea at Barmouth. At some earlier stage in the aggression by the Brythons it may be gathered that the Ordovices owned no land north of the Dee and within it, and that the old fortress on the northern bank of the Dee, overlooking the small town of Corwen, was probably a stronghold of the Goidels against the Ordovices of Mid-Wales, who formed, as it were, a wedge reaching the sea between the Mawddach and the Dovey, and completely severing the Goidels of North Wales from those towards the Severn Sea: their country may, roughly speaking, be identified with the Powys of later times, and that name, which probably meant merely a settlement, may be looked at as a very old one. On the shores of the Cardigan Bay several points may be indicated which successively marked the advance southwards of the Ordovices. They seem first to have conquered the coast from the Dovey to the Wyrè, a small river which reaches the sea some miles south of Aberystwyth, in Cardiganshire, together with a corresponding extent of country inland, all included in the old bishopric of Paternus or Padarn, whose name is now best known in connexion with his church of Llanbadarn Fawr, near the same town. The Wyrè marks the boundary of a Welsh dialect, peculiar to the northern part of Cardiganshire: it has much in common with the dialects of Merionethshire and Montgomeryshire, while it differs in certain particulars from those of Demetia. Later, the remainder of what is now Cardiganshire was conquered as far as the neighbourhood of the Teivi by Keredig, as mentioned in a previous chapter. This happened in Christian times, so that the displacement of the inhabitants does not seem to have been very great, which is in a measure proved by the dialect of that district being in most respects the same as that of the rest of Demetia. Moreover, David's name figures among the dedications in this district as it does more to the south, while the tombstone of a man of importance in Keredig's kingdom, probably a ruling prince, stands at Pembryn, overlooking the sea some miles north of Cardigan: his name was Corbalengi, and the inscriber has styled him an Ordous, meaning probably thereby one of the Ordovices.

East of the Ordovices the whole breadth of the island was occupied by the Cornavii and Coritani, the former of whom possessed a strip of country extending from the neighbourhood of the Worcestershire Avon, along the eastern bank of the Severn, and continued in a sort of an arc of a circle dipping into the sea between the Dee and the Mersey: it is possibly from the peninsula in which their territory ended that this people had its name of Cornavii, just as the south-west of Britain and the north-west of France both terminate in a Cornish district, as did also the north of Scotland: compare the Welsh word corn, of the same meaning and origin as the Latin cornu, and the English horn. North of the Mersey and the Humber most of the country, as far as the Caledonian Forest, belonged to the Brigantes. But the Parisi between the Humber and the Tees appear to have been independent of them, as were also probably the Novantæ, whose territory may have embraced all the country west of the Nith and south of the Ayr, as it undoubtedly included the promontory of the Novantæ, whereby the Mull of Galloway is supposed to have been meant. The name of the Nith in his time was Novios, and it is from it that this people got the name of Novantæ, given them probably by Brythons, in much the same way as the Segantii appear to have been so termed from their living near the river Segeia, which is supposed to have been the Mersey. To the east and north-east of the Novantæ dwelt the Selgovæ, protected by thick forests and a difficult country. They have left their name in the modern form of Solway to the moss and to the frith called after them. The word probably meant hunters, and the people to whom it applied may be supposed, not only to have been no Brythons, but to have been to no very great extent Celtic at all, except, perhaps, as to their language, which they may have adopted at an early date from the Goidelic invaders: in a great measure they were most likely a remnant of the aboriginal inhabitants, and the same remark may be supposed to be equally applicable to the Novantæ. It would not be surprising, then, to find that they acted together, and, on looking into the later history of the Roman occupation, we certainly seem to detect them as a people who gave the province a great deal of trouble. They lived between the Walls, and appeared in history as Genunians, we think, and Atecotti. Everything points to the conclusion that these were either the Selgovæ or the Novantæ, or rather the aggregate of them, and not least significant is the fact that the word Atecotti appears to have meant old or ancient, and marked them out as a people of older standing in the country than the Brythons, to whom they possibly owed that name. The struggle in which they took part against the Romans ended in their ultimately retaining only the country behind the Nith, where the name of the Novantæ becomes, in Bæda's mouth, that of the Niduarian Picts, known as the Picts of Galloway for centuries afterwards. We return to the Brigantes, whose name probably denoted a league of several peoples, or a dominant people ruling over a considerable territory containing a number of subject tribes, among whom may be mentioned the Segantii, in what is now probably Lancashire. The Otadini occupied a part of Lothian and the coast down to the southern Wall. They must have come sooner or later under the power of the Brigantes, as it is in this district that the latter bequeathed their name to Bernicia ; but whether they extended their sway also to the Dumnonii, we have no means of ascertaining. These last inhabited the country between the Novantæ, the Selgovæ, and the Otadini on the one hand, and the mouth of the Clyde and the Forth on the other, together with an extensive tract beyond those rivers, including the Northern Manaw or Manann, and reaching to the Earn—possibly to the Almond—and to the neighbourhood of Loch Leven in Fifeshire. Now, the southern Dumnonii, inhabiting as they did what was later the nucleus of the kingdom of the Cumbrians, must undoubtedly be regarded as their ancestors and as Brythons. So were the Otadini Brythons, and they are always treated as such in Welsh literature, where their name becomes Gododin and Guotodin; they disappeared early, their country having been seized in part by the Picts from the other side of the Forth, and in part by Germanic invaders from beyond the sea. But to return to the outlying portion of the Dumnonii, when the wall from the Clyde to the Forth was built they were cut off from their kinsmen, who were included in the Roman province, and possibly it is they who figure in history as Boresti, then as Verturiones, and the Men of Fortrenn. They formed the advanced posts of the Brythons, and they had given hostages to Agricola, and possibly to Severus, not to mention that their name of Verturiones may have meant the people of the land of the fortresses in allusion, either to stations¹ occupied by the Romans in their country, or to earlier works of their own construction, intended for the defence of their borders against the Goidels.

We have already suggested the position of the Caledonians, who were, as we understand their history, Goidels. They surrounded the country of the Brythons of Fortrenn, reaching from Loch Long and Loch Lomond along the Tay to the eastern part of Fife. According to Ptolemy they must have also extended inland to the Beaully Frith, but most of their country in that direction, and in the neighbourhood of the Tay, must have lain for a considerable time under the power of the aboriginal races to whom we now come. The position of the Vacomagi has already been described ; so has that of the Tæxali, and that of the Vernicomes, whom we have treated as identical with the Mæatae of history. The remaining peoples of the North, all probably non-Celtic in point of race, and mostly, perhaps, in that of language, were the following, as enumerated by Ptolemy :—The Epidii occupied most of the sea-board from where the Leven discharges the waters of Loch Lomond into the estuary of the Clyde, to the neighbourhood of Ben Nevis, and it is to them that the Epidian Promontory belonged, whereby Ptolemy is supposed to have meant the headland now called the Mull of Cantyre. Their name looks as though it had been one given them by a Brythonic people, and had meant horsemen, though they dwelt in a region where one would have rather expected coracles ; but its Brythonic appearance is, perhaps, only due to an accident, as we seem to have practically the same word in the name of the islands called Ebudæ, which, together with the others near them, from Tiree to Arran may have all belonged to them, though Ptolemy calls only one of them Epidion, which Mr. Skene¹ identifies with the Isle of Lismore ; but it may have been that of Jura. Beyond the Epidii, and inhabiting the west as far, presumably, as Cape Wrath, come three or four peoples, called by Ptolemy respectively Cerones, Creones, Carnonacæ, and Carini. At first sight we are tempted to regard the four names as merely clerical variants of a single one, but such a view is not countenanced by the still greater variety of the modern names, some, at least, of which may be supposed connected with some of those recorded by Ptolemy: witness the names of the lochs—Crinan, Creran, Carron, Kearon, Keiarn, and a good many others, involving the same consonants, and belonging to the western Highlands, but better known to the angler than the historian. The region from Cape Wrath to Duncansby Head may be said to have been the home of the Cornavii, so called for a reason which has already been suggested. The south-eastern side of the present counties of Caithness and Sutherland was divided between two peoples, called the Smertæ and the Lugi. Lastly, the coast from the neighbourhood of the Dornoch Frith to the confines of the Caledonians, belonged to a nation called the Decantæ.

¹ See Skene's "Celtic Scotland," i. p. 74.

¹ "Celtic Scotland," i. p. 69.

Now that we are dealing with Ptolemy's account of the north of the island, we may add a few words respecting the remarkable feature of Scotland known to the ancients as the Caledonian Forest. It was called in Latin Caledonius Saltus or Silva Caledonia, and in Welsh literature Coed Celyddon or the Wood of Calidon; while Ptolemy, who terms it Καληδόριος Δρυμός, by which there is no occasion to suppose him to have meant the chain of mountains called Drumalban, says that it was above the land of the Caledonians, whence the usual and erroneous idea that it must have been in the Western Highlands, in a region where one would hardly, perhaps, have expected it. The mistake has arisen from failing to realize Ptolemy's point of view; for, among other peculiarities of his description of the geography of Britain, he began from what he considered the most northern point of the island. And as he somehow made a mistake in his map of Scotland, and twisted eastwards what should have been north, his most northern point of Britain turns out to have been the headland of the Novantæ: it is thence he seems to have surveyed, as it were, the whole island. Beginning at that corner he enumerates the features of the coast until he reaches Cape Wrath, and from the same place he commences his description of the western coast southwards to Cornwall. He follows the same plan in enumerating the peoples inhabiting the country, and from his point of view the Vacomagi, who, like the Caledonian Forest, have sometimes been transported to the west because he states them to have been above the Caledonians, fall into their right place, and into possession of their towns, some of which cannot readily be removed far from the shore of the Moray Frith. Similarly interpreted, the Caledonian Forest is found to have been located by Ptolemy where there is every reason to suppose that it really was, namely, covering a tract where we are told that a thick wood of birch and hazel must once have stretched from the west of the district of Menteith, in the neighbourhood of Loch Lomond, across the country to Dunkeld.¹ It is this vast forest that probably formed in part at least the boundary between the Caledonians and the Verturiones or the Brythons of Fortrenn.

¹ Skene's "Celtic Scotland," i. p. 86.

We have already made some use of linguistic facts in trying to determine the nationality of some of the peoples brought under the reader's notice, and now we would bring them within the compass of few words. In doing so the place of importance is claimed for Celtic proper names which involve the consonant p. In the Greek language, for instance, this sound comes from two sources: thus, in πατήρ, it corresponds to the p in the Latin pater and the Sanskrit pitar, and to f in their English equivalent father: in this instance the Greeks had perpetuated the original Aryan p. But, as to the Celtic languages, it is found to have been one of their common and early characteristics that they got rid of this Aryan consonant, either by changing it in a few examples into another, or in the majority by dropping it altogether; so that the Irish word for father is not pathair, but athair, and the Celtic preposition corresponding to the Greek παρά, appears in Welsh as ar, and is given in Old Gaulish as are in the name of the cities termed by Cæsar *Aremorica*¹ from a Gaulish word which is in Welsh mor, sea: this latter, with the prefix, went to form the adjective applied to the states on or by the sea in the north-west of Gaul—a shorter form became usual, yielding Brittany the name of Armorica it sometimes bears. Greek, on the other hand, had words with a p from another origin, such as πέντε or πέμπε, five, in which that consonant corresponds to the qu of the Latin quinque. Some of the Celtic languages likewise supply us with a p of this origin, but not all of them, the Goidelic dialects having never made qv or qu into p: so in their early stages the sound of the letter p must have been utterly unknown. Thus the Welsh word corresponding to πέμπε and quinque is now pump, and it must have been somewhat similar in Gaulish, in which the name of the cinquefoil is recorded as pempedula; while in Old Irish, which reduced its early qv into c, the fifth numeral was cóic. When we have, then, a presumably Celtic word containing p, we know that we are dealing with one of the languages of what has been called the Gallo-British branch of the family, and not of the Goidelic one. Passing by such place-names as Præsidium and Prætorium as clearly Latin; Procolitia, Petrianæ, and Spinis as not improbably Latin; and such others as Durolipons as possibly in part Latin, we have the following left, which undoubtedly come either from a Brythonic language, or from that of the non-Celtic aborigines of the island:—

¹ "Bell. Gall.," v. 53; vii. 75; viii. 31.

- (1.) Mons Granpius or Graupius, from which the great battle where Agricola defeated Calgacus and his Caledonians took its name. It is thought to have been on the tongue of land at the meeting of the Isla with the Tay.
- (2.) Corstopiton or Corstopilon, supposed to be Corbridge in Northumberland.

- (3.) Epeiacon, the name of which has led to its being identified with Ebchester ; it has also been placed at Lanchester and Hexham. Ptolemy's figures, however, point rather to Keswick in Cumberland, but the name seems to signify a place for horses or cavalry, which appears to be the case also with Vereda, a station mentioned in the Antonine Itinerary and identified with Castle-Steads at Plumpton Wall, near Old Penrith, in the same county ; so it may be that the two names denoted one and the same town.
- (4.) Maponi, given by the anonymous geographer of Ravenna as the name of a place in Britain, and meaning probably the Fane of Maponos,¹ a god equated with Apollo on a fine monument at Hexham ; he was also probably the Mabon spoken of in the Mabinogion.²
- (5.) Parisi, the people between the Humber and the Tees.
- (6.) Petuaria, the name of the town ascribed to the Parisi by Ptolemy, the auxiliaries from which are termed Petuerienses in the Table of Dignities. It appears to have been at Hedon.
- (7.) Pennocrucion, which has been identified by some with Stretton, by others with Penkridge in Staffordshire : the old name survives in that of the latter town.

¹ The Berlin "Corpus Insc. Lat.," vii. No. 1345.

² Vol. ii. pp. 225, 226 ; 234, 235 ; 286, 287 ; 300, 301.

- (8.) Prasutagos, king of the Eцени, and husband of Queen Boudicca.
- (9.) Toliapis, at the mouth of the Thames, and now called the Isle of Sheppey, though no longer surrounded by the sea.
- (10.) Rutupiæ or Ritupiæ, identified with Richborough in Kent.
- (11.) Octapitaron, the name given by Ptolemy to St. David's Head: it comes most likely from the forgotten language of the non-Celtic inhabitants, and it occurs just in the vicinity of St. David's or Mynyw, called in the Welsh Chronicle Moni Iudeorum, which contains an allusion probably to the same people; and we may add that an old legend speaks of Sts. Teilo and David as opposed there by a Pictish prince called Baia or Boia,¹ a name which occupies a place of importance in the story of the Déisi in the Book of the Dun.
- (12.) Leucopibia, the name of a place somewhere in Galloway.
- (13.) Epidii, a name which we have already regarded as akin with the name of the islands called Ebudæ.

It has already been hinted that some of the names given by the ancients to non-Brythonic peoples may, nevertheless, be themselves Brythonic, the reason being that the Romans came more in contact with ¹ See the "Liber Landavensis," pp. 94, 95, and the "Lives of the Cambro-British Saints," pp. 124-126.

Brythons, and got more of their information from them than from the other populations. This may possibly be the explanation of such a name as Leucopibia. Among the more evident instances may be mentioned that of the Caledonians, who are called by ancient authors Caledonii and Calidones, in both of which the stem Calidon would seem to belong to Brythonic, rather than to Goidelic, in which it would be Calidin or Calidenn, as proved by the later forms. The difference of declension may be represented thus : the Goidelic inflections in point went on the same lines as Latin words like virgo, a virgin, genitive virginis, nom. plural virgines, while the Brythonic dialects had given the declension an evenness which did not originally belong to it by repeating the vowel of the nominative singular in all the cases, as if we had in Latin virgo, virgonis, and so on, which in fact we sometimes have, as when the unattested form hemo yields an accusative hemonem for the more usual hominem corresponding to a nominative homo, man. Another instance offers itself in the name of the Decantæ of northern Scotland, which is practically the same as that of the Decanti of Degannwy, near Llandudno, in North Wales, a place called Decantorum arx in the Welsh Chronicle. In both instances Decant- was probably the Brythonic pronunciation of Decent-, which in the mouths of Goidels, who regularly rid themselves of the nasal in such cases, became at a comparatively early date the Decet- or Decēt- of the inscriptional name of Mac-Decet on ancient monuments in Devon, Anglesey, and Ireland, among them being the largest early monument of the kind in the British Islands, that standing on rising ground near a bay of the Kenmare River in the south-west of Ireland. It is doubtful whether the name of the Novantæ is not likewise to be regarded as a merely Brythonic one, but it is less so in the case of a town of the Selgovæ: we allude to Carbantorigon, on the eastern bank of the Nith, for it is not impossible that we have the same name abbreviated in the CARVETIOR of a Roman inscription on a stone, at Penrith, in the neighbourhood of Carlisle, commemorating a man who had held a quæstorial office in the place it points to. If so, a Goidelic language was in use among the Selgovæ at the time the epitaph in question was written, or a non-Celtic one.

In some instances another means of distinguishing between Brythonic and the other languages of Britain is supplied by the consonantal combination cs or x usual in Gaulish, but long ago reduced in the Brythonic dialects into ch and h: while in the Goidelic ones it was made somewhat later into ss or s. Now, about a dozen Latin words with x have been borrowed into Welsh, and in none of them has the x been reduced to ch, but in all to is or s, as also in the word Sais, a Saxon in the sense of Englishman. So it would seem that the change from x into ch was obsolete before the ancestors of the Welsh had adopted the Latin words in question, or even, perhaps, before they had been much in contact with the Romans. Among the instances which concern us here, may be mentioned the Gaulish uxel- which appears in Welsh as uchel, high ; while in Irish and Scotch Gaelic it is uasal, high (in the metaphorical sense of high-born or noble and gentle) ; and the Brythonic form of this word is probably that which we have in the name of the Ochil Hills, in the country of the ancient Verturiones. It is remarkable, on the other hand, that most of the early names with x belong to districts which have before been pointed out as non-Brythonic. First may be mentioned the people called Tæxali, already spoken of. Then comes the mouth of a river Loxa, that can hardly be any other than the Lossie which falls into the Moray Firth in the land of the Vacomagi. Coming down south along the east of the island, we miss all names with x, nor do we find any in the south until we reach the country of the Dumnonii. There Ptolemy mentions a high town or high fort, called Uxella, and gives the estuary where the Taw and the Torridge meet the name of Vexalla. Proceeding northwards, we come across a doubtful instance between Pennocrucion and Vriconion, which the manuscripts of the Antonine Itinerary, where it is mentioned, variously call Uxacona, Usoccona, and Uscocona, and we stop finally in the neighbourhood of the Solway Firth. There, in the country of the Selgovæ, Ptolemy supplies us with another high town, called by him Uxellon, which must have been close to the mouth of the river Nith. But this is not all, since there was another high fort or high town, called Uxelodunon or Uxelodunion, situated at the mouth of the Ellen, on the coast of Cumberland, not far from the Derwent. Hence it may be inferred that, about the time of the coming of the Romans, a non-Brythonic people still possessed the shores of the Solway as far south as the river Derwent. Nay, possibly most of the lake district down to Morecambe Bay and Kendal, or still further south, was peopled by a mixed race of Goidels and non-Celtic aborigines; for Kendal is supposed to be the site of the ancient town of Concangion, the name of which is probably non-Celtic, and to be compared with that of the Decangi, near the Dee, with that of the Gangani, after whom Ptolemy calls the western-most point of Carnarvonshire, and with that of the Gangani, placed by the same geographer in the west of Ireland. After the building of the Roman wall, by which those south of it were severed from their kinsmen north of it, the former probably soon lost their national characteristics and became Brythonicized, while the Selgovæ remained to form, with the Novantæ, the formidable people of the Atecotti, who afterwards gave Roman Britain so much to do, until their power was broken by Theodosius, who enrolled their able-bodied men in the Roman army, and sent them away to the Continent, where no less than four distinct bodies of them served at the time when the Table of Dignities was drawn up. They were a fierce and warlike people, but by the end of the Roman occupation they seem to have been subdued or driven beyond the Nith, and within the dyke¹ which was, probably about that time, made from opposite the end of the Roman

¹ See Skene's "Celtic Scotland," i. p. 108.

Wall across the upper parts of the valleys draining themselves into the Solway, so as to end at Loch Ryan : here the language of the inhabitants down to the sixteenth century was Goidelic.

There are a few facts of another order which are in point here, and foremost among them may be mentioned, that the later Brythons, whether such by blood or merely by adopting a Brythonic language, as in the case of those of Cornwall and of parts of the north and of the south of Wales, agree in possessing legends about a great hero whom they call Arthur. Whether he was from the first a purely imaginary character in whom the best qualities of the race were supposed to meet, or he had a solid foundation in the facts of a long-forgotten history, it would be difficult to say ; but the popular imagination of the Brythons had fully developed his attributes before the twelfth century. He appears as the ideal champion of the race, donning the armour of a Christian general to lead the Brythons to war against the pagan invaders, whether Picts or Germans. The fortunes of the Brythons were his concern, and their wars were his wars, so that their great battles were believed to have been fought under his command ; nay, he was related to have with his own hand slain in each conflict a marvellous number of the foe. Sometimes, however, he is dimly seen in the background as a grand figure that does not descend into the arena : thus a Welsh poem¹ in a manuscript of the 12th century, describing the feats of valour of the Dumnonian prince Geraint in a battle fought probably with Ine of Wessex, speaks of Geraint's men as the men of Arthur : this was a long while, be it marked, after the time when Arthur is supposed to have lived. Now and then he even found his way into the chronicles ; but when that happened it was a good while after the date of the events in which he was supposed to have been concerned. Thus, according to Nennius, he it was that led the Brythons in the important battle of Badon Hill ; but Gildas, who felt a great interest in that battle, partly because it was fought in the year in which he himself was born, says nothing whatever about Arthur there or anywhere else. Had that Kymric Jeremiah lived a century or two later, he might have described Arthur's feats of superhuman prowess there at length. The Celts of Brittany regard Arthur as their own, so do those of Cornwall, though they have now adopted the language of their English neighbours, and so do the Kymry of Wales, while a most urgent claim has lately been advanced in favour of the district between the Roman Walls. This is quite natural : Arthur belongs to them all, wherever Celts have spoken a Brythonic language, from the Morbihan to the Caledonian Forest. It is characteristic of such popular creations that they localize themselves readily here and there and everywhere in the domain of the race in whose imagination they live and have their growth ; so the topography of Brythonic lands has no lack of Arthur's Hills, Arthur's Seats, Arthur's Quoits, Round Tables, and other belongings of his and his followers. The results of the search made into Scotch topography by those who have undertaken to find the home and cradle of Arthur in the North are partly puzzling and partly instructive. Passing by the abundant traces of him in the topography of the district between the Roman Walls, one fails to find any in the Brythonic country between Stirling on the Forth and Perth on the Tay, while one does get interesting instances in Strathmore and Forfarshire;¹ but it is as hard to believe that Arthur is not to be discovered in Fortrenn as it is to find any evidence of a Brythonic occupation extending to the neighbourhood of Forfar, and the subject deserves to be further studied. On the other hand, place-names show that wherever the Goidel carried his language he also peopled the country with the creatures of his own mythology; for most of Scotland beyond the friths, including the district between the Earn and the Tay, is found to have been, topographically speaking, possessed by Finn, Oisín, Diarmait, and the other widely-ranging heroes of that group, who belong no less to Scotland than to Ireland, being in fact, as universally Goidelic as Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table are the romantic property of the Brythons. If Arthur is to be treated as historical, the historian must look at him much in the same light as he does at Charlemagne, with all the legends that have gathered round his name. He will in that case find that the hero whom the Welsh sometimes call King Arthur and sometimes Arthur the Emperor, falls readily into the place and position of a successor of the Count of Britain ; and in favour of that view may be cited the fact that Arthur's name is best explained on the supposition that it is but the Welsh form which the Kymry have given to the Latin Artorius.¹ This is not enough to prove that he was of Roman origin, though it cannot but strongly remind one of the case of Aurelius Ambrosius.

¹ Skene's "Ancient Books of Wales," ii. pp. 37, 38.

¹ See Stuart Glennie's "Arthurian Localities" (Edinburgh, 1869), pp. 36-40.

¹ So far as we know, the credit of having first pointed this out belongs to Mr. Coote : see his "Romans of Britain," pp. 10, 11, 189, 190.

CHAPTER VII.

THE ETHNOLOGY OF BRITAIN.

(Continued.)

So far we have tried to draw the outlines of an ethnological map of Britain : we now pause to fill in a detail here and there where data happen to offer themselves. Cæsar tells us that the inhabitants of Britain in his day painted themselves with a dye extracted from woad ; by the time, however, of British independence under Carausius and Allectus, in the latter part of the third century, the fashion had so far fallen off in Roman Britain that the word Picti, Picts, or painted men, had got to mean the nations beyond the Northern Wall, and the people on the Solway were probably included under the same name, though they also went by the separate denomination of Atecotti. Now, all these Picts were natives of Britain, and the word Picti is found applied to them for the first time, in a panegyric by Eumenius, in the year 296 ; but in the year 360 another painted people appeared on the scene. They came from Ireland, and to distinguish these two sets of painted foes from one another, Latin historians left the painted natives to be called Picti, as had been the custom before, and for the painted invaders from Ireland they retained, untranslated, a Celtic word of the same (or nearly the same) meaning, namely Scotti. Neither the Picts nor the Scotti probably owned these names, the former of which is to be traced to Roman authors, while the latter was probably given the invaders from Ireland by the Brythons, whose country they crossed the sea to ravage. The Scots, however, did recognize a national name, which described them as painted, or tattooed men. Rather, we should say, it did more: it connoted the embellishment of the person, which the tattooing was supposed to effect. This word was *Cruithni*¹, which is found applied equally to the painted people of both islands, though one detects somewhat of a tendency on the part of the chroniclers to draw a distinction, the Irish Picts being more persistently called Cruithni, Latinized Cruthenii, or Crutheni, while the compound Cruithen-tuath or the nation of the Picts, was mostly appropriated to the Picts of Britain north of the Forth, who were also termed Piccardach, suggested by the Latin Picti, Pictavi, Pictones, Pictores, all of which terms have been used in reference to them. The eponymus of all the Picts was Cruithne, or Cruithnechan, and we have a kindred Brythonic form in Prydyn, the name by which Scotland once used to be known to the Kymry: the people have sometimes been called in

¹ It occurs as Cruthne in the gen. plural in the Book of the Dun, fol. 70a; late writers, however, prefer the adjectival form Cruithnig; nom. singular, Cruithnech.

Welsh literature, Gwyddyl Ffichti, Goidelic Picts, or Pictish Goidels, but Ffichti is not the regular rendering of Picti into Welsh, and it is not, we think, found in manuscripts earlier than the fourteenth century, so that this non-naturalized form can lay no claim to the importance which some historians have ascribed to it. These words, Cruithni and Prydyn are derived from cruth and pryd respectively, which mean form, and an Irish shanachie¹ has rightly explained the former as meaning a people who painted the forms (crotha) of beasts, birds, and fishes on their faces, and not on their faces only, but on the whole of the body. This agrees well enough with Claudian's vivid description of Stilicho's soldiery, scanning the figures punctured with iron on the body of the fallen Pict, and with the much later reference to the term Cruithni, which we seem to have in Isidore of Seville's words in the sixth century, when he wrote that the Scotti were named in their own tongue from their painting the body, since, as he went on to say, they were tattooed by means of iron points and of ink, with the marking of various figures.²

The word Scotti³ itself, as already hinted, appears to have referred to the same habit, as we have in

¹ Duald Mac Firbis, quoted by Todd in a note on the Irish version of Nennius, p. vi.

² This and other passages bearing on Britain will be found in Skene's "Chronicles of the Picts and Scots," pp. 393-395.

³ The word occurs for the first time in Ammianus Marcellinus's account (xx. 1) of an invasion of Roman Britain by the Scots and the Picts in the year 360.

Welsh the kindred words—ysgwthr, a cutting, carving or sculpturing, and ysgythru, to cut, lop, prune, to do the sculptor's work ; but the word also occurs meaning to dye or paint, though it is not quite clear whether this latter be not a signification derived from that of carving or sculpturing, by some such intermediate step as that of tattooing, of embossing, or mosaic work. Thus the word Scotti would seem to mean simply painted men, or else—and this is, on the whole, the more probable view—it meant persons who were cut, scarred, or disfigured. That would, at first sight, seem a forced explanation of the name, but it will be found, that, though the people who tattooed themselves regarded it as a way of beautifying their persons, others who did not practise it usually took quite the contrary view of the effect. Among the latter may be cited the legates of Pope Adrian, who, in reporting¹ to him their proceedings in Britain in 787, speak of God as having made man beautiful, and of the pagans of this country as “having by a diabolical impulse added to him most foul scars,” and they further remark that, “if any one endured for God's sake this injury of being dyed, he would therefore certainly receive a great reward.” Such a name, then, as Scotti, if we are not mistaken as to its meaning, is probably not one which that people gave itself ; it is to be traced, rather, to the Brythons of Roman Britain, and the Welsh words cited favour this view by suggesting, among other things, that in Scotti we have a participial formation from a verb scod ; but in that case the word could not well be Goidelic, as it should then have been, not Scotti, but Scossi, much in the same way as the Latin scindo, scidi, makes scissum, and not scittum. The fact has usually been overlooked that it is a term which has only come down to modern times practically as the Latin word for Goidels, wherever found, whether in this country or in Ireland. It has already been surmised that the use of the word was probably learned by the Romans from the Brythons of the province ; but it was found convenient to keep it to represent the people of Ireland without distinction, and afterwards all the tribes of the Goidelic race. So the Welshman or the Irishman, who would speak in his own language of a Gwyddel or Goidel, rendered it into Scottus as soon as he had occasion to write Latin; and from that was formed in due time Scottia or Scotia, to be the name for Ireland instead of Hibernia. It is needless to say that the word Scotia has no formation corresponding to it in any Celtic language : it is found used first by Isidore, but by the end of the seventh century Adamnan, a native of Ireland, employs it in writing Latin. Eventually, the old name reasserted itself, and the new one, having passed over into Scotland in the modern sense of the word, took root in its new home, and was fully established there during the War of Independence. The term Scotti was made in Irish into Scuit, but it is hardly ever to be met with in Irish literature, and its appearance there at all is probably due only to the importance it had acquired in legend. Among other things, it was too tempting not to compare it with the word Scythia, and hence sprang up a number of tales relating how the Irish came from Scythia to Ireland; this was, of course, only a part of the crop of clumsy inventions, which not only connected the Picts with the Gaulish Pictones and Pictavis whose names survive in those of Poitou and Poitiers, but with any other people to whom the adjective pictus had been applied by Latin authors: thus Virgil's allusion¹ to the Geloni in the line, did not fail to lead to the identification of more than one tribe in Ireland of Herculean descent.² But to whom did the name Scotti originally apply, that is to say, before the indiscriminate use of the word as the Latin equivalent for Goidil? Supposing we have made an approach to the true meaning of the word, it could only have denoted those of the Irish who continued the old fashion of tattooing themselves; but when those of a corner of the island got to be known as Cruithni, or Picts, most of the inhabitants of Ireland must have abstained from the practice of tattooing their persons. But, whatever the meaning of the word Scotti may have been, there is no reason to think that it denoted most or all of the people of Ireland, for they have never been known to the Kymry but by their national name of Goidel, which in Welsh is Gwyddel. Now, the portion of Ireland best known to history as Pictish was a pretty well-defined district, consisting of the present county of Antrim and most of that of Down. The northern half or so of the former was the home of the descendants of Riada or the Dál-Riada, whence the Dalriad Scots of Argyle, while another tract of that Pictish peninsula belonged to the descendants of Araide and Fiatach or the Dáln-Araide and Dál-Fiatach, who continued to be commonly known as Cruithni, or Picts, for a long time. They were probably to a great extent a non-Celtic people, frequently at war with the men of Ulster, which supplies one of the real reasons why they were so ready to leave their country, from the fugitive king who sought the protection of Agricola, to the Dalriads who settled in Cantyre, and the tribes that ravaged Roman Britain; for it may be supposed that all these supplied the bands of Scotti who joined the Picts in harassing the province. Their coming was probably very welcome to the Picts of the Solway in the great struggle which ended in the latter losing what may be taken to have been their territory east of the Nith. Once the Scots of the Pictish district of the north of Ireland had learned the way into the heart of the Roman province, other adventurers eager for plunder may have joined them, or taken routes of their own, though Gildas distinctly states that the Scots set out from the north-west. This agrees well with the fact that where Netherby now stands, to which the waters of the Solway once reached, there was, during the earlier part of the occupation, a Roman station called by the significant name of Castra Exploratorum, or the Camp of the Scouts; that at Netherstall, near Maryport, at the mouth of the river Ellen in Cumberland, where Uxelodunon stood, there was in the time of Hadrian a fleet under the command of M. Mænius Agrippa, whose name appears in several inscriptions from that neighbourhood; and that later, when the Selgovæ had been disposed of, the remainder of the Goidelic people on the Solway were enclosed by a rampart from the end of that frith to Loch Ryan.¹ As a rule, it is in their country the Irish invaders probably organized their expeditions southwards all the time they continued to come over.

¹ Haddan and Stubbs, “Councils,” &c., iii. p. 458.

“Eoasque domos Arabum pictosque Gelonos,”

¹ “Georgics,” ii. 115.

² See the “Irish Nennius,” pp. xxxix, 49.

It has, however, been sometimes supposed that it was in Wales the Irish invaders habitually landed; they may have done so occasionally, as in the case of the Déisi, the date of whose coming to Dyved is, nevertheless, uncertain, though it must have been previous to St. David's time. But it is highly improbable that it was their usual resort, as it was a country neither rich in booty nor easy to penetrate. Besides, had Wales been much exposed to the visitations of the Scots, it would be in the highest degree remarkable that not a single regiment of soldiers was located there by the Romans at the date of the compiling of the Table of Dignities, all being quartered in the north or the south-east of the province. Welsh tradition has been invoked to prove the invasion of Wales from Ireland in the fourth and fifth centuries, and mediæval travesties of the history of the incursions of the Danes, especially of those settled at Dublin, have been blindly brought forward in evidence. This is too fruitless a subject to discuss at length, and an instance or two will serve to show what has been sometimes done :—“Anlach, son of Coronac,” is moved back to this period by writers who do not detect in him the well-known Dane, Anlaf Cuaran, and, similarly, the leader of the Goidels in their last battle with “Caswallon Lawhir,” is called Serrigi or Sirigi, a corrupt form of some such a name as Sitric clumsily torn out of a Latin context, while Caswallon turns out to have been a Welsh prince of the tenth century, and not the father of Maelgwn in the sixth. Moreover the name was in both instances Cadwallon before being improved into that of the ancient general, Cassivelaunos, who fought against Julius Cæsar. There are many more similar pits into which Welsh legendary history is wont to lead the unsuspecting. What has usually been regarded as evidence for the invasion of Wales from Ireland proves on examination to be no such a thing; but the references we have made to the Déisi of Dyved will prevent the conclusion from being drawn that no evidence of the kind exists at all. However, the author has so recently become acquainted with it, and the difficulties which it introduces are so considerable, especially as to determining who of the Goidels of the West of Britain represented the ancient inhabitants, and who of them were invaders from the sister island, that he must content himself with merely warning the reader that the question is entering on a new phase. Provisionally, he may assume that the Goidels of the districts in point were partly of the one origin and partly of the other: in any case, Goidels they were, and their language continued to exist in Wales down to the end probably of the seventh century, possibly somewhat later in out-of-the-way corners of the country. To fix the time of its utter disappearance would be impossible, but Dr. Hübner, the greatest German epigraphist who has studied the inscriptions of Britain, places one¹ of them, written in Latin and Goidelic, and found on the south of the Teivi, near Cardigan, among those which he assigns to the seventh or possibly to the eighth century, the classification being mainly based on the forms of the letters used. Now, when those of our early inscriptions, which are non-Roman and begin to date soon after the departure of the legions, have their localities marked on a map of Wales, it is found that hardly any of them occur in what was the country of the Ordovices; in fact, they may be said to crowd together in the tract within the Clwyd, the Dee, and the Mawddach in North Wales, while in South Wales they form two groups: an eastern one around a line drawn from Brecon to Neath in Glamorgan; and the other, the more important one, in the district west of the length of the Towy. All the inscriptions belong to Christian times, but it is not to be concluded that the people of the epigraphic area were converted to Christianity before those of the rest of the country. For not only were

¹ Skene's "Celtic Scotland," i. 108.

¹ "Inscrip. Brit. Christ.," No. 108.

Cunedda and his people Christians, but it was by members of the former's family, or by men who enjoyed its protection, that Christianity was mainly, so far as we know it, spread among the Goidels; and, even if they were Christians previously, it is from the Cunedda saints that the organization of the Church in Wales has come down to us, so that whatever Christianity existed among the Goidels before their labours, was so completely covered by the latter as to have been almost wholly forgotten. Thus, so far as we know, St. David was the first who systematically undertook to Christianize the people of Dyved or Demetia; he was grandson of Keredig, who gave his name to Keredigion and was son of Cunedda. Then as to Kentigern, who founded the bishopric of St. Asaph, he did so under the protection of Cadwallon, Maelgwn's father, while it was under the auspices of Maelgwn himself, that Daniel, or, as he is called in Welsh, Deiniol, became the first bishop of Bangor in Arvon, whither he came from the great monastic establishment at Bangor on the Dee. We have, then, to look elsewhere for the explanation of the comparative lack of inscriptions in the Brythonic area of Wales, and we are forced to believe that it arose from a difference in the manner of burying the dead. Among the first things to strike one is the fact that the country of the Ordovices is almost wholly devoid of those rude stone structures called cromlechs, which are found to crowd together in the same districts as the inscriptions, especially in the island of Mona and the county of Pembroke; and the conclusion darkly suggests itself that it was the same race that set up the cromlechs and erected the maenhirs or longstone monuments of the Principality; probably we should not be far wrong in considering the maenhir to be as old, to say the least of it, as the cromlech, and merely a less elaborate and expensive way of attaining the same object of commemorating the dead; but it is a question which archæology cannot be said to have seriously considered, or even perhaps clearly formulated, though it undertakes to distinguish the burial-places of the Celts from those of the pre-Celtic peoples of Britain, the former having the round barrows assigned to them, and the latter the long ones. This may be, in the main, correct, and it may be that the archæologist has no data to help him to more exact results, but he should bear in mind that his study of the tombs falls short of the historian's wish so long as he cannot tell the resting-place of a Brython from that of a Goidel, and both from those of the neolithic native. The two last would seem from the latest archæological investigations to have buried in long barrows, but some of those barrows contain the dead placed with care to sit grimly in their subterranean houses, while others disclose only the huddled bones of men and beasts, as though they were the remains of cannibal feastings. Can they be ascribed to the same race? We doubt it. As to the people, however, of the Brythonic branch who have not been given to the erection of great stone monuments, there is no difficulty in supposing them to have continued in Christian times their use of the barrows, of which so many scores are known clustering around the ancient temple of Stonehenge and in other parts of the country. Now, the mound of earth which we call a barrow or a tumulus, offered no great opportunities for the writer of epitaphs, but the maenhirs did ; so it may be assumed that, when the Goidels became acquainted with writing and had the example of the Romans before their eyes, they not unwillingly began to imitate them in having their monuments lettered. But a survey of the latter, both in Britain and Ireland, gives one the impression that what they still chiefly thought of was the size and durability of the stone used ; it might be inscribed or not, that was an after-thought and a luxury unknown to their ancestors. But, in case any writing was indulged in, the language was usually Latin, which seems to have continued to be the official and learned tongue. In about two dozen instances in this country, however, the Goidelic language was used mostly to accompany a Latin version, and written in a peculiar character called Ogam. This last would seem to have been invented by a Goidelic native of Siluria or Demetia, who, having acquired a knowledge of the Roman alphabet and some practice in a simple system of scoring numbers, elaborated the latter into an alphabet of his own fitted for cutting on stone or wood. From South Wales we presume it to have been introduced to Ireland, especially the south and south-west ; and, on the other hand, to Devon, but hardly at all, so far as one can discover, to Cornwall, and only sparingly to North Wales, while the Ogams of Scotland need not be discussed, as they seem to be of later introduction, showing traces of the influence of manuscript writing on parchment. Looking at the Ogam epitaphs of Ireland, of which more than 200 are said to have existed, and most of which are still extant chiefly in the counties of Waterford, Cork, and Kerry, one finds that, though they belong to Christian times, the burial-places in which they occur are commonly unconnected with churches, and used only for interring unbaptized persons, or else no longer used at all: thus it would seem that they are the old pagan burial-places, continued in use in Christian times by a Christian people. The stones are, in many instances, the objects of a reverence bordering very closely on worship, a state of things of which we find a trace in the Welsh legend¹ about St. David splitting with a stroke of his sword the capstone of the cromlech in Gower, called Maen Cetti, in order to show to the people that it had no divine attributes: thereupon they are said to have been converted to his religion. The belief, however, in such stones was probably far too deeply rooted to be readily got rid of, and the Church possibly had no difficulty in making them articulate witnesses to a kind of merit recognized by a class of inscriptions in Wales, dating usually about the eighth century or later, and having nothing exactly corresponding to them in any other part of western Christendom. One, for instance, runs thus:—“The cross of Christ: Enniaun made it for the soul of Guorgoret;” and another thus:—“In the name of God the highest begins the cross of the Saviour, which Samson, the abbot, prepared for his own soul and for that of Ithel, the king," &c. Another one, however, near Bridgend has been supposed to be of the beginning of the seventh century, and it runs thus:—"Conbellini set up this cross for the soul of his scitlivissi." The last word is unmistakably Goidelic, and must have meant a man who acted as messenger or scout. But this class of inscriptions is not to be severed from another which is still better known, especially in Ireland. It may be illustrated by the following specimen from Gwnnws in Cardiganshire:—"Whoever shall have read this name let him give a blessing on behalf of the soul of Hiroidil, son of Carotinn," the name alluded to being a figure forming at once a sort of a wheel-cross and the Greek monogram of Christ.¹

¹ Iolo MSS., p. 83.

Returning to the older inscriptions, they seem to show that by the sixth century the Ordovices had carried their Brythonic speech into the district north of the Mawddach, and even into that portion of the modern county of Carnarvon which consists of the old deanery of Eivionydd, and looks, as it were, towards Harlech; but the country from the Mawddach to the north of Eivionydd was made up of Arudwy and Eivionydd, which together are sometimes called Dunodig, from Dunod, a son of Cunedda, who is said to have conquered it from the Goidels. How far

¹ The inscriptions are respectively Nos. 73, 62, 67, and 122 in Hübner's "Inscrip. Brit. Christ.;" see also Westwood's "Lapid. Walliæ."

Brythonic speech had then penetrated into the neighbourhood of Snowdon it is impossible to say, but we find a decidedly Goidelic epitaph so far east as the immediate neighbourhood of Ruthin, in the basin of the Clwyd. In South Wales most of Cardiganshire was probably still Goidelic, though it had long been conquered by the Cunedda family under the rule of Keredig. But not only was all the country north of a line from the Wyre to the bend of the Wye near Talgarth, in Breconshire, or thereabouts, now probably Brythonic, but the Goidelic country south of it seems, if we may trust the indications afforded by the inscriptions, to have been severed into two regions, of which the one lay west of the Towy, and the other on both sides of a line drawn from Brecon to Neath, in Glamorgan. More exactly speaking, the latter consisted of two distinct districts, a southern one between Cardiff and Loughor, and a northern one in the upper valley of the Usk, with Brecon as its central point, and taking in the old deaneries of Brecon, probably the ancient patrimony of Brychan, who has so large a place in Welsh hagiology. Both he and his numerous offspring may have been more Goidelic than Brythonic, though they were in various ways allied with the Cunedda family. The country east of these two districts, from the hills of Brecknock and the lower course of the Taff, seems to have become Brythonic: when and how, it is very hard to say. It was brought about partly, perhaps, by the influence of the nearest Brythonic tribes east of the Severn, as suggested by the fact that one of the most important inscriptions of ancient Glamorgan commemorates a prince called Bodvoci,¹ a name at once Gaulish and Brythonic, which had been in esteem among the Dobunni, on whose gold coins it figured before they submitted to the Roman yoke. It was partly due also, no doubt, to conquests of the Ordovices in the direction of the mouth of the Severn. The history of those conquests, however, is lost, but attention has already been called to the power of Maelgwn over all parts of South Wales, and we have possibly a proof of the southern advance of the Ordovices in Dinas Powys, the name of a place in the vicinity of Cardiff. The epigraphic map, if we may use the term, further suggests that the eastern Goidelic districts were cut off from connection with the western one by a strip of Brythonic land, reaching from the country of the Ordovices to the basin of the Towy, and down the eastern bank of that river to the sea. This, it will be seen, would include the district of Kidwelly, from which, together with Gower, Nennius² expressly mentions the driving out of the Goidels by Cunedda and his sons. But Welsh tradition sometimes ascribes the expulsion to Cunedda and Urien of Rheged, and sometimes to the latter alone; while the districts in question are specified to have been Gower and Kidwelly, together with Carnwyllon and Iscennen, between the Tawè and the

¹ See Hübner's "Inscrip. Brit. Christianæ," No. 71, and Rhys's "Lectures on Welsh Philology," p. 386.

² San-Marte's "Nennius and Gildas," p. 36.

Towy, together with its tributary the Cothi.¹ Nennius mentions Urien as one of the four kings of the Brythons opposed to Hussa, who began his reign over Bernicia in the year 567. The reason for his leaving the North is probably to be sought in the feuds which culminated in the great battle of Arderydd in 573, when the combatants on both sides are surmised to have been Celts. The conquests of Urien in the land of the southern Goidels do not appear to have formed an integral part of the Cunedda legend, so we seem to be at liberty to place them in this part of the sixth century. But it is needless to say that they were hardly undertaken without the leave of the over-king of the Cunedda dynasty. These measures may have been called for by the Goidels trying to make fresh conquests, and Urien, who could, for some reason or other, be spared from the North, may have been made use of to crush them with his following of Brythons. In any case the result must have practically put an end for ever in South Wales to the aspirations of the Goidels, if they had any. There are other indications to the same effect, especially in the legendary life of St. David, written by Rhygyvarch, bishop of St. David's, in the latter part of the eleventh century.² We are there told of a severe struggle between the saint and the prince called Boia. This pagan chief, sometimes called a Scot and sometimes a Pict, was, of course, discomfited by the miracles said to have been wrought by David ; and in due time both he and his wife came to a bad end, which may be taken to mean that the saint was backed to such an extent by the power of the Cunedda family, to which he belonged on the father's side, that local opposition was of no avail against him. The name of the king ruling over Demetia at the time when Gildas wrote, was Vortiporios, a decidedly non-Goidelic name, which appears in the Nennian genealogies in the Welsh form of Guortepir, son of Aircol, whose name must be the Welsh reduction of the Latin Agricola. Aircol's father was Triphun, which also seems to be a non-Goidelic name, but Triphun and his sons are said to have been the princes of Demetia at the time of St. David's birth. During some part of King Triphun's reign, Keredigion seems to have been ruled by Sanctus or Sant, the son of Keredig, and the father of St. David, according to whose legendary life Sant had become a monk, and gone to Demetia, where he met the nun who became the mother of St. David ; but the incident is easier to understand if we suppose him to have been at the time not only king of Keredigion, but possessed of power enough in Demetia to enable him to do there much as he liked. In any case, the king of Demetia does not seem to have had much authority left to him as against the princes of the house of Cunedda. The ancestors of Triphun had possibly made the best of the situation by adopting the religion of the dominant race, and allying themselves by marriage with the Cunedda dynasty ; but however that may be, the princes of his house affected non-Goidelic names, though they derived their origin from Ireland, being, as they were, descended from the Munster exiles. The proof of this is to be found in the agreement between their pedigree as given in the legend of the Déisi and in the Nennian Genealogies.¹ We are reminded by it that the words of Nennius as to the expulsion of the Scotti are not to be interpreted too literally; for, as their princes in Dyved were allowed to remain, it is not likely that the clansmen were driven out of the country. The power of the Goidels here had probably been broken ever since the conquests of Keredig, who was doubtless the Coroticus of a letter² of St. Patrick, in which the saint holds him up to detestation on account of the cruelty of his men towards certain converted Goidels whom they had taken captive. To revert to St. David, it is important to bear in mind that he was probably a Goidel, on the mother's side: this explains, at least in part, why his labours were always directed to the Goidelic districts, and also why men from Ireland came to sit at his feet. It, moreover, gives a meaning to a curious passage in his life, which describes how Gildas's preaching in Demetia was, once on a time, brought to an abrupt end by the mysterious influence of the greatness of David, even when he happened to be present only in embryo. The story seems to make too great a difference between the two men in point of age ; but the fact it dimly sets forth is that Gildas, who was a Brython of the Brythons, could not hope for the same following among the Goidels as a man, who to his connexion with a powerful Brythonic family added probably a native's knowledge of Goidelic speech, and complete sympathy with everything Goidelic except Goidelic paganism. But it is in Cadoc that we find David's most formidable rival. Cadoc, like his brother saint, may have been connected by blood with the house of Cunedda, but whether that was so or not, he seems to have had the support of Maelgwn, its redoubtable head ; and, like David, he seems to have possessed the qualifications calculated to make his ministration acceptable to the Goidels. The reputation, however, which he has left behind him is rather one for learning and wisdom ; while churches dedicated to David are to be found here and there in all parts of South Wales, except that which formed the old diocese of St. Padarn.

¹ Iolo MSS., pp. 70, 71.

² It has been alluded to at p. 229: see also "Cambro-Brit. SS.," pp. 117-143.

¹ The former is given in the Bodley MSS., Laud Misc. 610, and Rawlinson B. 502, already alluded to, and the latter in the Harleian MS. 3,859, where the portion of Triphun's genealogy which should show the Irish descent is replaced by a fabrication which includes as his remote ancestors both Maximus and Constantine. It will be found printed in the pedigree of Elen, wife to Howel the Good, in the preface to Williams' "Ann. Cambriæ," p. x.

² Published by Haddan and Stubbs in their "Councils and Eccles. Documents," ii., pp. 314-319.

The Brythonic people who may be presumed to have buried in barrows have left us an inscription in Montgomeryshire, and another in Merionethshire, in both of which the deceased is said to have been placed in a barrow or mound—in tumulo :

the same expression occurs also in an epitaph not very far from Edinburgh, and another near Yarrow Kirk, in the county of Selkirk. This contrasts with the great majority of the epitaphs from the Goidelic parts of Wales and Dumnonia, in which we are simply told that the deceased "lies," jacit, or "lies here," hic jacit. There are, however, a few of the former description on Goidelic ground or on its boundaries: one such occurs in Cornwall, one or possibly two in South Wales, and a curious one in Carnarvonshire, in which the dead is said to lie in a congeries lapidum or cairn of stones.¹ All the above interments belonged, probably, to Brythons, or were made under the influence of the Brythonic fashion spreading among the Goidels. Compared with the other and more numerous epitaphs, they are on an average longer and fuller, more in accordance with the Roman custom, and characterized by a far greater variety of formula, which would seem to show that they appertained to a people much more given to writing than the Goidels can have been, though the latter made more frequent use of it in honouring the dead. It is probably with these Brythonic burials that we have to class the cairn, removed in 1832, in the immediate neighbourhood of Mold, in Flintshire. It was believed in the country around to be haunted by a spectre in gold armour, and when more than 300 loads of stones had been carted away the workmen came to the skeleton of a tall and powerful man placed at full length. He had been laid there clad in a finely wrought corslet of gold, with a lining of bronze: the former was found to be a thin plate of the precious metal, measuring three feet seven inches long by eight inches wide. Near at hand were discovered 300 amber beads and traces of something made of iron, together with an urn full of ashes standing about three yards from the skeleton. The work on the corslet is believed to have been foreign, and is termed Etruscan by Prof. Boyd Dawkins.¹ The burial belongs to an age when cremation was not entirely obsolete in this country, and we should probably not be wrong in attributing it to the time of the Roman occupation. On the whole, the duty of commemorating the dead among the Celts may be supposed to have devolved on the bards to whom we are probably indebted for the seventy or more triplets devoted to this object and preserved in a Welsh manuscript of the twelfth century.² The last of them, which, remarkably enough, has to do with a grave in this same district of Mold, runs as follows, when freely rendered into English:—

¹ See Hübner, Nos. 125, 131, 211, 209, 7, 52, 234, 136: compare also Kuhn's "Beiträge," iii. p. 73, where Stokes gives Gaulish and Irish parallels, and San-Marte's "Nennius and Gildas," p. 78.

Whose is the grave in the great glade?
Proud was his hand on his blade—
There Beli the giant's son is laid.

A word now respecting the people whom the Celts found in possession of the island when they came here: little is known for certain about them, though a good deal may be inferred, as we have had frequent occasions to suggest. From the nature of the case the first Celtic invaders, that is to say, the Celts of the Goidelic branch, were those who had most to do with the aborigines, and it may be doubted whether the Brythons ever came much in contact with them. So when they adopted Celtic speech and habits, it was those of the Goidels they learnt and not of the Brythons; and, looked at from the opposite point of view, it is hardly open to doubt that the Goidelic race was profoundly modified in many respects by its absorption and assimilation of the indigenous element. It is here, in fact, we are to look for the explanation of a good deal of the difference of speech between the Welsh and the Irish, not to mention that the study of the skulls of the present inhabitants of the British Islands, of their physique and complexion, has convinced anthropologists that we still have among us a large number of men who are at least in part the descendants of non-Aryan ancestors. Indeed, we seem to detect their influence on the Goidels even within the narrow circle of their ancient inscriptions. The subject is a difficult one, and we can only touch it superficially. The full Aryan proper name was of the class to which such instances as the Greek Θεού-δωρος and Δωρό-θεος belong, from θεός, god, and δῶρον, a gift; and abundance of names compounded in the same easy way are to be found in every Celtic language; but by their side the Goidels have others which are not compounds, and to which the other Aryan languages offer few parallels. One of these is Maccu Deceti or Decet's Son, a name which occurs in epitaphs in Mona, in Devon, and various places in the southern half of Ireland, with Deceti spelt in such a variety of ways as to suggest a non-Celtic origin. It was probably the name of a god-ancestor or eponymus, and we seem to have it, as already observed, in a Brythonic form in the name of the people called Decantæ, in the north of Scotland, and of the Decanti of the Arx Decantorum or Degannwy, in North Wales, whence we are, perhaps, entitled to infer that Decanti was one of the names the Brythons gave the Goidels in the background of the Ordovices. Still more instructive is such a name as Maelumi or Mael-Umi, the slave or servant of bronze, which possibly testifies to a national devotion to the sword, a weapon which the ancient Irish regarded as inspired and capable, among other things, of giving the lie to the perjurer; for mael means shorn or tonsured, and here refers, probably, to the tonsure with which the Goidels were familiar as denoting servitude, even before the Church introduced a somewhat different observance among them. They went on forming Christian names in the same fashion, as may be learned from such well-known instances as Mael-Padraig, Patrick's slave, and Gille-Christ, Christ's servant, Anglicized respectively Mulpatrick and Gilchrist.¹ Another word used in the same way was mug or mog, a slave, as in the proper name, Mog-Nuadat, Nuada's-Slave, where Nuada—in Welsh, Nudd and Lludd, better known in English as Lud—was a name of the god of the sea. Irish legend makes him husband of the Boyne, and the Silurians worshipped him under the name of Nōdens, or Nūdens, in a temple of Roman make at Lydney, on the western bank of the Severn. To the same class belongs Mog-Neid or Mog-Nét, Nét's-Slave, a name in which Nét was, according to Cormac, that of a god of war of the pagan Goidels. More correctly speaking, he seems to have been a war-god of the non-Celtic race in both Ireland and Britain; for an old inscription in the county of Kerry gives the name without a case-ending, and so marks it out as a probably non-Celtic word; and it is worthy of notice that the man's name Mog-Nét, appears in the eighth century among the Transmontane Picts of Alban as evidence that the same amalgamation of the same races had begun there also. It occurs reduced to Moneit in one of the chronicles as the name of the father of Biceot, one of the officers of Nechtan when he was defeated by Ungust in 729 near the waters of the Spey. The Kerry monument¹ alluded to introduces us to another remarkable class of names, for it is found to commemorate a man called Nét's-Hound son of Ri's-Hound. The latter usually becomes Roi in Irish literature, in the name of a well-known legendary hero, called Cú-Roi mac Dairi, or Roi's-Hound son of Dairi. This Ri or Roi was probably another of the gods of the non-Celtic race, as was also most likely Corb, whence such names of men as Mog-Corb, Corb's-Slave, and Cú-Corb, Corb's-Hound, were derived. Plenty more of this dog nomenclature could be produced from Irish literature, such as Cú-Ulad, the Hound of the Ultonians, and Cú-Mide, the Hound of Meath. Macbeth is also probably a name of the same kind. It was current in Ireland as well as in Scotland, and was sometimes treated as purely Goidelic, which would make it mean Son of Life; but such an abstract interpretation is discountenanced by Maelbeth, which was likewise used in both islands, and must have meant the Slave of Beth. That this last word meant some dog divinity or dog-totem, is suggested by the probable identity of Macbeth—not of Duncan, as we think—with the Hundason, or Hound's-Son, of one of the Orkney Sagas which relate to their time. In that case, Maelbeth would be a partial translation into Gaelic of the name, which, completely rendered into it, produced the *Maelchon*¹ we have more than once mentioned in connexion with the Pictish kings; this, at any rate, meant the Hound's Slave. Similarly Macbeth, put wholly into Goidelic, would be Mac-Con, or the Hound's Son, which occurs as the name of a mythical prince, whose sway was not confined to Ireland, but extended, according to Cormac, to the part of Britain in which Glastonbury stood. Mac-Con may, perhaps, be regarded as representing the whole non-Celtic race of these islands. It would fill too much space to go into the details of this question, but enough has been said to make it probable that the dog was a most highly respected totem or god of that race, and also to call to mind the words of Herodotus, who would seem to have heard of such a people when he speaks of a race called the Kynesii or Kynetes; both of these terms have the look of Greek words meaning dog-men. His first mention of them comes in the second book (c. 33), where he speaks thus:—"The Celts are outside the Pillars of Hercules, and they border on the Kynesii, who dwell the furthest away towards the west of the inhabitants of Europe." The other passage occurs in the fourth book (c. 49), where he speaks in the same way, mentioning the Celts as the furthest away towards the setting of the sun, with the exception of the Kynetes. So far as the words of Herodotus go, one might suppose that the race he had in view was the non-Celtic one of Britain and Ireland; but later writers, such as Avienus, locate them in the west of the Spanish peninsula, which suggests a still more important inference—namely, that there existed in Herodotus's time a Continental people of the same origin and habits as the non-Celtic aborigines of these islands. What the name of the latter was in this country we are not quite sure, but in Ireland it was Ivernii in Ptolemy's time; and he mentions a town there called Ivernus, and a river Ivernios. To these may be added various forms of the name of the island, such as Juvenal's Iuerna, distorted more usually by the Romans into Hibernia; the Iverna of a graffito to be seen till lately in the Palace of the Cæsars in Rome; the Irish Ériu, accusative Érinn; and the Welsh Iwerddon; not to mention 'Ιέρων, disembowelled of its v or w by Greek pronunciation, just as in Irish itself an early Iverjo has yielded Ériu, while the name of the Ivernii appears as Ierni,¹ Erni, and Erna in Irish literature, which musters them latest and strongest in Munster, though it also makes them give their name to Loch Erne in Ulster. It may be added that the fact of our having the same word as the Goidelic name of Ireland used also as that of the river Earn² in Scotland, suggests that one would not, perhaps, greatly err in applying the term Ivernii, or Ivernian, to the non-Celtic natives of Britain as well as of the sister island. Their eponymous ancestor in the latter is variously called Ier, Iar, Er, Ir, Eber, Emer, and Heber,³ while the legend makes the whole Irish people⁴ descend from two brothers, of

¹ See his "Early Man in Britain," pp. 431-433.

² See Skene's "Ancient Books of Wales," pp. 28-35.

¹ See page 72 of this volume, and compare Semitic names like Abdiel, &c.

¹ See Brash's "Ogam Monuments," p. 175, and plate xvi. : the reading is Conu Nett moqví Conu Ri: compare also the Hebrew Caleb, dog.

¹ The nominative would be Mael-Con, and the full genitive might be expected to be Maile-Chon; but, as in certain other instances of the same kind, we have never met with the longer form, except in Bæda's Hist. iii. 4, where it is duly written Meilochon.

¹ This important form is to be inferred from ier diernaið (Iver de Iverniis), in "Lebar na h-Uidre," p. 99a.

² See Berchan's Prophecy in Skene's "Chr. of the Picts and Scots," pp. 84, 88, 98; also a confused bit of geography cited in Reeves's "Culdees," p. 124, where sraith hirend must refer to Stratherne.

³ B, m (modern bh, mh) usually represent the sound of v.

⁴ See Fiac's Hymn in Stokes's "Goidelica," pp. 127, 131.

whom Emer was the one, and much to their credit, Airem (genitive Airemon) the other, whose name means a ploughman ; for he represented the Aryan farmer who introduced agriculture, however rude, among a people of hunters or shepherds, and is, moreover, described as the first in Ireland to yoke cattle for work. This is all in harmony with what is stated in the old Irish Laws, that in Érin all law emanated from the Féini or the waggon-men, whence it was sometimes called Féineachus.¹ As the Celt was destined to have the upper hand over the Ivernian, the legend makes Airem slay Emer, and seize on the southern half of the island, which was supposed to have been the latter's kingdom ; but the two races agreed in being warlike, so the two brothers are described as the sons of a soldier or warrior, whom the legend therefore calls Miled in Irish, and Miles in Latin, whence the so-called Milesian Irish. But this phantom soldier sometimes had another name—*Galam*² or Golan, meaning likewise a warrior or a brave man, from the word gal, passion, violence, valour, of the same origin as Galli, the alternative designation of the Continental Celts, the meaning of which we have already tried to explain. But the simple division of Ireland between the two ancestors of the Irish proved insufficient for the legend-mongers, since there were descendants of Emer in the north as well as in the south ; so the legend got complicated with an Er or Ir, differentiated from Emer or Heber in order to be his son, and to be the father of the northern Ivernians. These last partly succumbed to the northern O'Neils and partly retreated beyond the Bann to what was afterwards known as the country of the Irish Picts or the Scots proper: there they stubbornly resisted the advance of the Ultonians, though some of them found it necessary to seek a home in Britain. Next to Munster this land of Dalriada, Dalnaraide, and Dalfiatach remained probably the most thoroughly Ivernian and the least purely Celtic in the island. It was found necessary to expand the story about Miled in another direction by giving him an uncle to bear the name of Ith and account for several places in Ireland called Mag-Ithe or the plain of Ith. This was probably non-Celtic, and it entered into the name of the Scotch island of Tiree, known formerly as Tirieth and Terra Hith. It is most likely the same name which we have met in that of the Lothian town of Iudeu mentioned by Nennius, and in that of the Judic people of the district around St. David's. While we are occupied with the names of the ancient inhabitants, we may as well mention another, that of Firbolg, given them in Irish legend, and explained as meaning the bag-men or sack-men. That would be right if we had here to do with the Irish word bolg; but it is more probably a different one, an Ivernian vocable, since it occurs as the epithet of a Pictish king called Gartnait, and as Bolge comes among Pictish names in the legend of St. Andrew.¹ It meets us also probably in the country of the Selgovæ, in the name of a place called Blatobulgion in the Antonine Itinerary, and supposed to have been situated near Middleby Kirk, not very far from the river Annan; and also, perhaps, in the country of the Tæxali in the modern name of Strath-bolgie in Aberdeenshire, to which may be added Bolgyne from Macbeth's grant of land already mentioned. In Ireland it enters into names like Dúnbolg, near Donard, in the county of Wicklow, while in Wales, where the word takes the same form of bdl as the Welsh for belly, we have a well-established group of such place-names in the middle of Anglesey, as Cors y Bol, the swamp of the Bol, Rhos y Bol, the moor of the Bol, and Pen-bol; also Llanol, formerly Llanvol, the church of Bol.²

¹ See the "Senchus Mór," i. pp. 52, 116.

² See O'Curry's "MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History," p. 447.

At what time the Ivernian language became extinct in Ireland it is impossible to discover, but in Munster it appears to have not been long dead when Cormac wrote a sort of glossary in the ninth century, and alluded to it as the Iarn or iron language; for, owing to an accident of Irish phonology, both isern-, the early form of the Celtic word for iron, and Ivern- must become iarn in the later stages of the language, so that Cormac believed that in Iarn he had the ordinary Irish word for iron, or affected so to believe in order to proceed to explain, that it was so called on account of the difficulty of seeing through it, owing to its darkness and the compactness of its texture. He has, however, recorded two of the Ivernian words known to him, namely, fern, anything good, and ond, a stone. But these, together with Nét, Corb, Ri, and others in his work which may be suspected of being Ivernian, have hitherto thrown no light on the origin of the language; but should it turn out that those who without hesitation call our Ivernians Iberians, and bring them into relationship with the Basque-speaking people of France and Spain, are right in doing so, one could not at all wonder that Cormac considered the Ivernian a dark speech. In the north of Ireland that idiom may have been extinct in the time of Adamnan; and Columba in the sixth century cannot have known it, which, nevertheless, does not prove that there were no peasants who spoke it there in his time. However that may be, Adamnan mentions a name into which ond, a stone, possibly enters, to wit, that of Ondemone, a place where the Irish Picts were beaten by the Ultonians in the year 563: it seems to have been near the Bann, between Loch Neagh and the mouth of that river. As for Britain, one of the most thoroughly non-Celtic portions of it south of the Clyde was probably that of the Selgovæ or hunters in Roman times, and later the more limited Pictish district beyond the Nith, but there is nothing to prove that the inhabitants had retained their non-Celtic tongue down to the sixth century, or lost it before the Roman occupation. North of the Friths it is otherwise, as we have indications in Adamnan's Life of Columba that the language of the aborigines was still a living tongue. Adamnan wrote a little before the close of the seventh century, and his work has come down to us in a manuscript of the eighth. Now Columba, about whom he wrote, came from the north of Ireland, and spoke the Goidelic language: he passed over to the new settlement of the Dalriad Scots in Cantyre in 563, when he was forty-two years of age. Shortly afterwards he had the island of Iona given him, where he established his religious house, over which Adamnan presided in a later age. Not long after Columba's coming over to Britain he crossed Drumalban on a mission to Brude, king of the Picts, who had his stronghold in the neighbourhood of the river Ness, not far, probably, from its mouth. To him and his men Columba appears to have had no difficulty in making himself understood. But when, as we are told, he was in the province of the Picts, probably a little later but in much the same district, we read of him preaching to peasants or plebeians by interpreter. At another time he happened to be in the island of Skye, when a boat arrived with two young men who brought their aged father to be baptized by Columba. This time also he preached by interpreter, though the convert bore the Celtic name of Artbranan, and is described as the chief of the Geonians, called by Adamnan Geona Cohors, in which we seem to have the name of a people of the mainland, called Cerones in the manuscripts of Ptolemy's Geography. They had their representative among the legendary sons of Cruithne in that one of the latter called Ce. The use here made of the word cohors has already been noticed as a rendering of the Goidelic word dál, which is proved to have been applied by the Goidels to the people of that region by the name Dalar, which the Norsemen were wont to give the Western Highlands: it has been the custom of historians to try wrongly to derive it from the Dalriads of Cantyre. The question now arises as to what was the language of the people whom Columba could only address by interpreter. There were in Britain two groups of Celtic dialects, the Goidelic and the Brythonic; but there is no reason to suppose that the peasants near King Brude's palace were Brythons, and still less probable is it that those who visited Columba in Skye were of that race. It has usually been supposed that they merely differed from the missionary Scot in speaking a Goidelic dialect, which was not his; but such a view does scant justice to the devotion of the early saints of Ireland to their work, and there is no reason whatever to suppose that they could not speedily master dialectical differences, which were at most of no very important nature in that early age. So far from this being the case, the usual silence as to interpreters suggests that it was not a rare thing for Goidels to master the language of the Brythons, and the latter that of the former, so far as to be able to make their way in one another's country, though it must have given them infinitely more trouble than any dialect closely akin to their own. It remains, then, that the language of the people who could not understand Columba was not Celtic : in all probability it was that of the ancient inhabitants. In the district in which the power of the Picts grew into a considerable state, where the remarkable succession, known as Pictish, obtained and lasted longest, it appears that Goidelic was unintelligible to the peasants in the sixth century, while in the west, opposite Skye, even men of rank among the Picts could be found who knew no Goidelic, though they had begun to adopt Goidelic names, just as, in Wales, many a John Jones has that English name, though he cannot speak English or pronounce his name in the English way. Here may also be mentioned Argyle, as it is found variously called Oirir Gaithel, Airer Gaethel, and Arregaethel, meaning the region belonging to the Goidels or Gaelic-speaking people, just as Airer Dalriatai meant the country of the Dalriads ; so, to give the word Argyle its full meaning, it must be supposed that, at the time it came into use, the Picts to the north of the district properly so called were as yet not Goidels : that is to say, they still had a language of their own. Bæda enumerates¹ the peoples of Britain, in whose languages Christianity was taught ni his day, as being the Angles, the Brythons, the Scotti (that is to say, the Goidels), the Picts, and the Latins. But so far as regards the Pictish language, the significance of his words is sometimes explained away by supposing it to have been a Celtic dialect lying somewhere between Brythonic and Goidelic, but rather nearer the latter. There is, however, no reason to suppose that to have been Bæda's view ; for in the case of English, he was content to let the language of the Angles stand for all the dialects without mentioning, for instance, that of the Saxons. For a long time, probably before Pictish or Ivernian wholly died out, it was loaded with words borrowed from Goidelic ; but there is no ground whatever to suppose that it otherwise resembled Goidelic or any other Aryan tongue ; and, if what we have surmised as to the name Macbeth should prove well founded, it would tend to show that the non-Celtic speech did not become completely extinct till about the restoration for a time, in the eleventh century, of the Pictish kingdom, in the person of the king of that name. The subject cannot be here gone into at length but we may say that there are data which tend to prove that the non-Celtic aborigines spoke what was practically one and the same language in both Britain and Ireland, and that it will probably be found to have been derived from the same source as Basque. Moreover, we are inclined to believe that it has left its influence on Goidelic, and it may be presumed, that where the ancient inhabitants were unable to hold their own, they were not extirpated by the Goidels but gradually assimilated by them. At first the Goidel probably drove the Ivernian back towards the west and the north, but, when another invasion came, that of the Brythons, he was driven back in the same way ; that is, he was, forced, so to say, into the arms of the Ivernian native, to make common cause with him against the common enemy. Then followed the amalgamation of the Goidelic and Ivernian elements ; for wherever traces of the latter are found we seem to come upon the native in the process of making himself a Goidelic Celt, and before becoming Welsh or English in speech he first became Goidelic in every instance south of the Clyde. This means, from the Celtic point of view, that the Goidelic race of history is not wholly Celtic or Aryan, but that it inherits in part a claim to the soil of these islands, derived from possession at a time when, as yet, no Aryan waggoner had driven into Europe ; and it is, perhaps, from their Kynesian ancestry that the Irish of the present day have inherited the lively humour and ready wit, which, among other characteristics, distinguish them from the Celts of the Brythonic branch, most of whom, especially the Kymry, are a people still more mixed, as they consist of the Goidelic element of the compound nature already suggested, with an ample mixture of Brythonic blood, introduced mostly by the Ordovices. And as to Welsh, it is, roughly speaking, the Brythonic language as spoken by the Ordovices, and as learned by the Goidelic peoples overshadowed by them in the Principality of Wales. This harmonizes with the actual distribution of the four chief dialects of spoken Welsh, which are those respectively of the Ordovic land of Powys, Siluria or Gwent, Demetia or Dyved, and Venedot or Gwynedd.

¹ Skene's "Chr. of Picts and Scots," p. 187.

² There is no church on the spot now, but an early inscription has been found there: see Rhys's "Lect. on Welsh Philology," p. 361: the form Lanvol occurs in the "Record of Carnarvon," p. 63.

¹ "Hist. Eccl.," i. 1.

Skulls are harder than consonants, and races lurk behind when languages slink away. The lineal descendants of the neolithic aborigines are ever among us, possibly even those of a still earlier race. On the other hand, we can imagine the Kynesian impatiently hearing out the last echoes of palæolithic speech ; we can guess dimly how the Goidel gradually silenced the Kynesian ; we can detect the former coming slowly round to the key-note of the Brython ; and, lastly, we know how the Englishman is engaged, linguistically speaking, in drowning the voice of both in our own day. This intrusion upon intrusion of one race on another renders it very hard to treat intelligibly of such a people, for example, as the Welsh, at any rate without repeatedly making the wearisome round of circumlocution ; thus, a man may happen to be dealing with them chiefly in an anthropological sense as Brythons, and as distinguished from Goidels, while he may be understood to be looking ethnologically at them as forming certain well-known linguistic or political aggregates, which in point of race consist of mixed groups of Brythons, Goidels, and non-Aryans. We are not sanguine enough to suppose that the possibility of misunderstandings of the nature here indicated has been successfully avoided in these pages. All we can reasonably expect the reader's mind to retain, is a certain impression of a somewhat confused picture of one wave of speech chasing another and forcing it to dash itself into oblivion on the western confines of the Aryan world : that we should fondly dream English likely to be the last, comes only from our being unable to see into a distant future pregnant with untold changes of no less grave a nature than have taken place in the dreary wastes of the past.

APPENDIX.

ADDITIONAL NOTES ON SOME OF THE NAMES IN THE TEXT.

ΑΘΘΕΔΟΜΑΡΟΣ, p. 36. The second part of this name, māros, is supposed to be the same word as the Welsh mawr, great, large, Irish már or mór, and it enters into a great many Celtic names. With regard to the other part, it is first to be observed that some of the Gallo-Brythonic Celts of antiquity lisped their ss in certain positions into ðð or θθ; but this habit was neither general nor has it come down into Welsh. The genitive of Aððedomaros is read Assedomari in an inscription found in Styria (Berlin "Corpus Inscr. Lat.," iii. No. 5,291); and a Welsh name, partly identical, is met with in a Welsh MS. of the twelfth century, to wit, Guynnassed (see "Skene's Ancient Books of Wales," ii. p. 32), which would now be written Gwynasedd. But the number of Welsh words that should throw light on the meaning of asedd is somewhat embarrassing: first comes asen, a rib, plural eis, ribs, also the roof beams which run the length of a house; then we have an asedd, which would, at first sight, seem to be the word wanted, but is probably a collective plural of as-en standing for an earlier ansija; lastly may be mentioned aseth, which may be a variation of the same word as assedo: it means a spit or spear. Thus Aððedomaros would appear to mean one who is great as to his spear, and Gwynasedd would be, so to speak, Whitespear. The related forms are Gothic ans, a beam, O. Norse áss, a pole, a main rafter, a yard; also probably the Latin asser, a beam, pole, or stake. It would thus appear that aðð and ass in the name in question stand for an earlier ans, and this has an important bearing on the interpretation of other old names. A different theory, which I am unable to accept, has been proposed by the learned professor M. d'Arbois de Jubainville, in his recently published work, entitled "Études Grammaticales," pp. 32*-38.*

ADMINIUS, p. 34. The form Amminius, which is the one on coins, shows that Adminius is a Latinizing of Amminios under the influence of the notion that the name began with the prefix ad.

ALAUNA, p. 160. We have possibly the same name in the Welsh Alun, borne by a stream that joins the Dee not far from Chester.

ALLOBROX, p. 139. Allobrox, pl. Allobroges, appears in that form as the name of a Celtic people in Gaul. It is likewise read Allobrogae, a word thus explained by an ancient scholiast on Juvenal, viii. 233:—"Allobrogae Galli sunt. Ideo autem dicti Allobrogae quoniam brogae Galli agrum dicunt, alla autem aliud; dicti autem Allobrogae quia ex alio loco fuerant translati" (see Jahn's "Juvenal," p. 303, and Diefenbach's "Orig. Europ.," s. v. Allobrogae). So the allo- of this name goes with the Greek ἄλλο-, as against the Latin aliu-s; for the Gallo-Brythonic Celts agreed with the Greeks in making lj (j = y in the Eng. word yes) into ll; Brox, brogae, and brogae are represented in Welsh by bro, a district or country. The Irish form mruig, more frequently bruig, has been ascertained to be the same word as the English march, and German mark, a boundary or district. Probably the Latin margo, edge or boundary, is derived from the same source. The old Gaulish had made mr into br, as Welsh has in bro, which enters also into the Welsh word Cymro, a Welshman, pl. Cymry, for Com-brax and Com-broges respectively. The vowel of the second part varied in Welsh as in troed, foot, traed, feet, since the Welsh word for a Welshwoman is Cymraes, and for the Welsh language Cymraeg, implying early forms, Combragista and Combragica. All this tends to show that the original combination was mrg, which has been simplified differently in the different languages. The national name, Cymro, seems to have been confined to the Kymric Celts, though the Bretons sometimes give the simple brð the sense of compatriot; and, whether the Kymry have ethnologically anything to do with the Cimbri or not, the names have absolutely nothing in common, in spite of what charlatans continue to say to the contrary.

ANTEORIGUS, p. 37. The coins give Antedrigus, Ante9 and other abbreviations; so I have ventured to regard the name as Antedrigus of the U declension, though the meaning of the word is obscure.

ATECOTTI, pp. 56, 91, 220. This seems to be the most correct spelling of the word, as it is probably to be resolved into Ate-cotti, the latter element being practically identical with the Cornish word coth, Breton coz, old or ancient. Ate is the early form of the prefix which appears in modern Welsh as ad, at, in such words as adgas or atcas, odious, from cas, hateful. With Atecotti as meaning ancient inhabitants, compare the Irish Tuath Sen-Cheneoil and Tuath Sen-Erann, the tribe of the Old Race, and the tribe of the Old Ivernians respectively, in the lists of Irish tribes in O'Curry's "Manners and Customs of the Ancient Irish," vol. i. pp. xxviii. &c.

ATREBATES, p. 9. It is also treated as Atrebatii, which has been resolved into Ad-treb-at, and derived from ad-treb, whence the Irish verb attrebaim, "I dwell or inhabit," and the Welsh athref in the term tir athref, whereby was meant the land immediately around the dwelling. Thus it appears that Atrebates meant inhabitants, but probably in the special sense of farmers or homestead men. It may be added that the Welsh word tref has its equivalents in the English thorp, German dorf, and their congeners.

• BELGÆ, p. 42. The derivation and meaning of this word are unknown, but one thing is certain: neither the people nor its name had anything whatever to do with the Irish Fir-bolg. Nor is there any reason to suppose that the Belgæ were Teutons.

• BELISAMA, p. 68. The meaning of the name is unknown, but in point of form the word seems to be a superlative like Uxama: this occurs in the name of a Gaulish town in Spain called by Ptolemy Uxama Barca which would in Welsh be Barca Uchaf or Upper Barca, literally, in accordance with Celtic idiom, Uppermost Barca. Possibly Auximum (now Osimo), a town of the Piceni, may be compared.

• BITURIX, p. 65. The plural was Bituriges, and the name of the people is now perpetuated by the town of Bourges: it seems to have meant Weltherrscher or world-kings, bitu being the same word which we have in the Welsh hyd, world, Irish, bith, gen. betho.

• BLATOBULGION, p. 269. This is a curious name, and the following notes may be of interest:—The story of Branwen, daughter of Llyr, describes Bran, her brother, leading a host to Ireland and on the point of being received into a spacious palace by the Irish, when one of his men, having gone before, found that they had two hundred bags in different parts of the building containing each a warrior ready for battle: he asked the Irish what was in each bag (bol), and they persistently replied that it was meal (blawd). He went round, and quietly killed all the soldiers in the bags by squeezing each man's skull between his fingers: then he sang an englyn on "the curious kind of meal" he had found in the bags ("Mab.," iii. pp. 95, 96; 120, 121). On the Irish side we have the account of the battle of Dúnbolg, in Wicklow, published by O'Donovan in his edition of the "Four Masters" under the year 594, when, according to some, it took place. This story makes a provincial Irish king Bran Dub conquer the King of Érin by passing in the night into the latter's camp with a large number of wild horses and some thousands of oxen bearing hampers on their backs. The hampers were supposed by the sentinels to be full of food for the King of Érin, but they contained armed men, who presently attacked the camp, and tied small bags full of stones to increase the confusion. The result was the utter defeat of Bran's enemies, and that the place came to be called the fort of sacks or Dún-bolg. Treated as Celtic, Blatobulgion must have literally meant the Meal-bag, and it consists of early forms of the words cited from the Mabinogi of Branwen. It is, however, possible that bulgion, bolg, and bòl in all the foregoing instances are not words of Celtic origin, and that they had another meaning. The name in the Itinerary has hitherto been treated as two words; but it occurs only once, namely, in the ablative case, and we have no hesitation in reading Blatobulgio instead of the unintelligible Blato Bulgio of the editors. This is another happy suggestion, for which we are indebted to Mr. Henry Bradley.

BORESTI, pp. 89, 95. It is difficult not to regard the first two syllables of this name as the Brythonic equivalent of the word forest, which comes to us from the Low Latin foresta. The Boresti were very probably the same people as the Verturiones ; and in that case they formed the outlying portion of the nation of the Brythons, and dwelt on the outskirts of the Caledonian Forest.

BOUDICCA, p. 66. This or Bōdicca is doubtless the most correct form of the name, though it is not clear why the c is doubled : the ordinary Boadicea is the gibberish of editors. The name occurs as Bodicca in a Roman inscription found in Africa (Berlin, "Corpus Inscr. Lat." viii. No. 2877), and Bodicius is read in an inscription commemorating a man belonging to a cohort of Brittones in Pannonia (iii. No. 3256). But Boudica or Boudicas is the spelling in a Roman inscription found in Spain (ii. No. 455), and the name Budic was not an unusual one formerly in Brittany. It is commonly supposed that they are all of the same origin as the Welsh word budd, benefit, advantage, and buddugol, victorious, so that Boudicca might perhaps be equated in point of meaning with such a Latin name as Victorina.

BRIGANTES, pp. 30, 39, 113. Some would have it that this name meant mountaineers or hill-men from the same origin as the Welsh bre, a hill, and bryn, the same. But there are other words which seem to offer a better explanation, such as Welsh bri, renown, eminence, braint, privilege, formerly written bryeint for brigeint-, representing an early brigantia or brigantion according as the word was fem. or neuter. From the stem brigant- was formed an adjective brigant-in-, which was reduced in Cornish to brentyn or bryntyn : it meant noble, free, privileged, the contrary of kêth, enslaved, while in Welsh it became brëenhin, now brenhin, a king, which has nothing to do with Brennus, though old-fashioned philologists still fancy it has. Phonologically brigant- in all these words is the Gallo-Brythonic form of a common Celtic brigant- which with the nasal regularly suppressed we have in the Irish name Brigit (for Brigentis of the I declension), St. Bridget or Bride. On the whole, then, Brigantes would seem to have meant the free men or privileged race as contrasted with the Goidelic inhabitants, some of whom they may have reduced under them.

CALEDONIA, p. 88. This was probably a word like Britannia, made by the Romans, while the native term may be supposed to have been Calido, genitive Calidinos, whence Caidenn in Dúnchaiden or Dunkeld, and in early Brythonic Calido, genitive Calidonos, now Celyddon as in Coed Celyddon, the Caledonian Forest.

CALGACOS, p. 89. This seems a preferable spelling to Galgacos, as the word if Celtic may be derived from the same origin as the Irish word colg or calg, a sword; but another etymology is suggested by the Irish word celg, cunning, treachery: compare the name of the Irish hero called Celtchar na Celg or C. of the Wiles, in an Irish poem to be found in Windisch's "Irische Texte," p. 215.

CALLEVA, pp. 24, 29. This possibly meant a town in the wood, and is to be explained by means of the Welsh collective cell-i, a wood, a copse: the simpler form cell meant a grove as in cell o ysgaw, a grove of elder, but it has been ousted by and confounded with the other cell, which is the Latin cella: the Irish word was caill, a wood. If this guess be right, it would suggest that the first syllable of the present name Silchester stands for the Latin word silva.

CAMULODUNON, p. 26. The locative occurs on coins as Camuloduno. Dunon is the word which makes din, a fortress or town in Welsh, and the whole name seems to have meant the town of Camulos, who appears as one of the gods of the Gauls. His name also seems to enter into the proper name Camelorigi on an early inscribed stone in Pembrokeshire, and Camuloris, Camulorigho on a lead coffin found in Anglesey: see "Lect. on Welsh Phil.," pp. 364, 400.

CARATACOS, p. 35. The Romans wrote Caratacus, and the editors have made it into Caractacus, which is gibberish. Carat- represents the passive part of the verb, which is in Welsh car-u, to love, and the affix -āc is frequently used in proper names. The name is very common in Mod. Welsh as Caradog, and in Irish as Carthach, genitive Carthaig, perpetuated in an Anglicized form by the Irish families that call themselves MacCarthy.

CARAUSIUS, p. 93. The origin of this name is uncertain: it probably became popular in Britain, for we find it on an early inscribed stone at Penmachno, near Bettws y Coed.

CARBANTORIGON, p. 231. This may be taken to be a somewhat perverted spelling of Carbantorion, much in the same way as we had Bergyon for Iberion. The geographer of Ravenna writes simply Carbantium.

CARTISMANDUA, p. 39. It is also found written Cartimandua, and the second element seems to be the same as the first part of the name Mandubratios, and we have it in such Gaulish ones as Viromandui and Epomanduoduron.

CASSI, pp. 17, 28. Supposing the ss to stand here for an earlier ns, the name might be taken to be connected with the Gothic hansa, a band or host, German hanse, a league, whence the name of the Hanse Towns. The word Cassi in that case appears to have meant allies or confederates: see Veneti. The tribal idea of a common ancestor had perhaps given or been giving way to the more purely political one of alliance and mutual defence: see Catti and Aððedomaros.

CASSIVELAUNOS, pp. 15, 246. The reading adopted by the best editors of the Latin texts in which the name occurs is Cassivellaunus, but I have little doubt that the ll is no more warranted here than in Uxeldunon, to be mentioned later. The whole name would seem, in accordance with what has already been guessed with regard to Cassi, to mean a ruler of the league or a tribe-king; for Velaunos probably meant a prince or one who reigned, the root being the same as that of the Welsh gwlad, Irish flaith (pp. 67, 137), English, wield, German, walten, to rule, and probably also that of the Latin valere, to be strong. The epigraphic instances in point are the following:—(1.) VELLAVNIVS in an inscription at Caerleon (Berlin “Corpus Insc. Lat.” vii. No. 126). (2.) CATVALLAVNA, describing the nationality of a woman married to a Palmyrene husband and buried at South Shields (“Ephemeris Epigraphica,” iv. p. 212, No. 718*a*): the inscription commemorating this Catuvelaunian lady is in somewhat rustic Latin, and the compound has dropped the formative vowel of the first element in the compound, so that Catuvelauna is here read Cat-vallauna. (3.) VELAVNI, the name of an Alpine people (“Corpus Insc. Lat.,” v. No. 7817, 45). (4.) VELAVNIS, the nominative of a man’s name in two inscriptions found in Spain (iii. Nos. 1589, 1590). (5.) VALAMNI, the genitive of a man’s name on an Ogam-inscribed stone from the county of Cork, and written in Mod. Irish Follamhain in the family name O’Follamhain, which English spelling simplifies into O’Fallon. The forms with val for vel represent probably a somewhat later stage of pronunciation among the Brythons than the others do, and the Goidelic Valamni further suggests that they and the Gauls had already begun to soften mn into vn, so that it would, perhaps, be more correct to write Cassivelavnos. Welsh tradition before the time of Geoffrey of Monmouth probably knew little of Cassivelaunos: his name was shaped after the analogy of Cadwallon and the like into Caswallon, which was then not unfrequently substituted for the former in quasi-historical writings. Cadwallon, however, is most likely a name very differently formed, standing, as it may be supposed, for Catuvéljo, genitive Catuvéljonos; and a Brythonic veljo, veljonos, would in Irish be somewhat of the form feliu, felenn or foliu, folann, and we have a derivative from it in the Irish verb follnaim, I reign. Besides an early Brythonic veljo, there was probably a velatros, of the same meaning: it is postulated by the Welsh name Cadwaladr. All these names are, most likely, to be kept distinct from the valos implied by such a name as Cadwal, identical with the German Hathovulf, and meaning battle-wolf, where Welsh wal is to be equated with the wolf so common in German and English proper names: this wal, in its turn, yields derivatives in an, such as Buddwalan.

CATTI, p. 29. The view that Catti was the name of a people depends on its being identical with Cassi: for Catti might also be the genitive singular of a personal name, since we have the nominative Cattos on a Gaulish coin: see Cassi.

CATURIGES, p. 30. The word is made up of rīges, the plural of rīx, a king, and catu, of the same origin as the An.-Sax. heatho-, war. In Irish it is cath, and in Mod. Welsh cad, where it means a battle. The name would accordingly signify battle-kings or war-kings.

CATUVELAUNI: see Cassivelaunos and Caturiges.

CELTÆ, p. 2. This word is sometimes explained as the equivalent of the Latin celsi, in the sense of tall men; but celse nati would be a preferable interpretation. Better would be the German word held, a hero, and better still the O. Norse hild-r, which not only meant war, but was also the name of one of the Valkyrias, regarded as the handmaids of Woden, while it entered into many proper names like Hildibrandr and Brynhildr. Among the cognate forms may be mentioned Lith. kalti, to strike, to hammer as a smith, perkalti, to strike through, Latin percellere, to strike, smite, to beat down. Lastly, it is possible that the word should be regarded as resembling Brittones in point of meaning (see p. 210), and that we should connect it with the Irish word celt, dress or raiment, whence the Scotch word kilt.

CENIMAGNI, pp. 17, 28. The conjecture that Cenimagni stands for Ecenimagni would require, to establish it, that one should assign the meanings of both parts, eceni and magni. This is unfortunately difficult to do; but it may be supposed that ecen- is to be equated with the Welsh word egin, which now has no other signification than that of sprouts or germs of a blade-like form, and one may surmise that it originally connoted sharpness, as its etymology is probably the same as that of the Latin acuere, to sharpen, acies, edge, sharp edge. In that case Eceni originally referred to some sort of sword or knife, and the word magni was added to particularise it; but in what sense is not evident. For magn- would probably yield either maen or mān in Welsh, of which the former means stone, while mān means small or fine. Provisionally taking the latter, the whole term would mean the Men of the Small Knives; in that case it is clear that the adjective might frequently be dispensed with, and then the people would be simply called Eceni. This, in fact, would be a sort of Celtic parallel to that of the Saxons, supposed to be so called from their use of the knife they termed seax. A part of the Gaulish people of the Aulerici was also called Cenomani; so, perhaps after all, the safest view to take, is to consider this to be practically the same name as that of our Cenimagni, and that the British people so called were a Belgic tribe, to whom no other allusion has been found. Lastly, if we treat Ecenii as the whole name, it would probably be more correct to consider it to have been of the more derivative form Ecenii, meaning men armed with blades or swordsmen.

COGIDUMNOS, p. 79. Tacitus has Cogidumno in the dative, and all that is legible of the name in the inscription is GIDVBNI for the genitive Cogidubni, with bn for the mn of the MSS., an interchange which is very common, and suggests that both mn and bn had already been softened into vn.

COMMIOS, p. 9. The meaning of this name is uncertain, but we have a simpler form of the same origin in the Gaulish Comus, with which the Comux of an old British coin is probably identical, with x for s, which was not very unusual: see Tincommios.

CONBELLINI, p. 252. The reading of this name is somewhat difficult, but it seems to be the same name as Cunobelinos, but in a later stage and in a Goidelic dialect.

CONCANGION, p. 233. The other names with which this seems to range itself are Gangani and Decangi, the latter being possibly the same legend that is read De Ceangi on pigs of lead found in Cheshire and Staffordshire: see the Berlin "Corp. Insc. Lat.," vii. Nos. 1,204, 1,205, 1,206, with which compare No. 1,207 found in the country of the Brigantes, in the West Riding of Yorkshire: it is said to read Brig. and not De Brig.

CORITANI, pp. 30, 106. This name may have been derived from the pre-Celtic inhabitants who possibly survived in the inaccessible districts near the Wash, which reached formerly almost to where Cambridge now stands. Add to this that we are reminded of the Pict as far south as the Kettering district in Northants, where there is a place called Pytchley, formerly Pihtes leá: see Kemble's "Codex Diplom." 443 (Ap. to vol. iii); also Wilson's "Prehistoric Annals of Scotland," i. p. 287. According to another reading of Ptolemy, the people's name was not Coritani, but Coritavi; but it is not so well supported, and we give the preference to the other.

CORNAVII, pp. 30, 219. The Welsh corn, a horn, was probably a U stem like the Latin cornu, but in other cases the u may have been diphthongized so that the genitive, for instance, may have been cornav-os, from which an adjective was formed, making in the singular Cornavjo-s, and in the plural Cornavji. In Cormac's Glossary the Cornavii of Dumnonia are called Bretain Corn, or the Brythons of the Horn, if, indeed, the south-west corner of Wales be not what was meant. In an account of the Danes and Norsemen flocking together for the struggle which ended with the battle of Clontarf, some are said to have come from the Corn-Britons of St. David's, and allusion is there made to another Corn, which may possibly have been the headland between the Dee and the Mersey, which was in the possession of the Danes at one time. See Skene's "Celtic Scotland," i. p. 387.

CUNEGLASOS, p. 122. This is given by Gildas in the vocative as Cuneglase, which he asserts to have meant in Latin lanio fulve, the tawny butcher. The element, cune, is more usually met with as cuno or cuna, as in Cuno-belinos and Cuna-lipi. The reason for the variation is that the formative vowel was even then but slightly pronounced: later it disappeared altogether, leaving these names in the forms Conglas and Conbelin, whence later Cynlas and Cynfelyn. The meaning and origin of cuno are obscure; but Gildas may have had in his mind the Welsh word for a dog, which is now cŷ, plural cwn, though in his time it was probably cū, genitive cūno(s), and what he renders lanio may well have meant, considering the mood he was in, a champion or great warrior. The corresponding Teutonic vocable was hun, the meaning of which is also obscure, though that of giant has been suggested. The following Celtic names in point have their exact equivalents in the list of Old German ones:—Cunoval-i (Mod. Welsh, Cynwal), Cunalip-i (which would be in Mod. Welsh Cynllib), and Cunomor-i (Mod. Welsh, Cynfor) = Hunulf, Hunlaif, and Hunmar.

CUNOBELINOS, p. 26. This name has been in vogue among the Welsh, by whom it has been successively written Conbelin and Cynfelyn. The first element, cuno, is mentioned under Cuneglasos, and the other seems to consist of the name of the god Belenos or Belinos. Continental inscriptions equate Belinos with Apollo; he was worshipped by the Gauls, and probably also by the Brythons, though we do not happen to have any votive tablets that would prove it. But the supposition is favoured by the fact of his name entering into that of Cunobelinos, which hardly stands alone, as the well-known Welsh name Llywelyn probably represents an early compound Lugubelinos.

DECANGI, p. 81. The reading formerly adopted was inde Cangos, while the sense requires in Decangos, which seems to yield the same name as that read De Ceangi on the pigs of lead already alluded to. The question of the locality of this people is a very difficult one; but one thing which makes for the district between the Dee and the Clwyd, is that it produces lead, and bears in Welsh the name of Tegeingl, which shows some similarity to the names here in question. It would still further remove some of the difficulty if we could suppose the Decangi to have inhabited the country on both sides of the estuary of the Dee.

DECANTÆ, DECANTI, pp. 224, 230. These are virtually, no doubt, one and the same name; but that of the people from whom Degannwy was called arx Decantorum in the Welsh Chronicle differs slightly from Degannwy, since this last appears to represent a related form Decantovion, or the like. It is possible that Tacitus's words in Decangos should be emended into in Decantos, which would bring the Roman army to the neighbourhood of the Conwy.

DEIRA, p. 114. The origin of the Welsh Deivr or Deifr, from which this name comes, is obscure, but it may be presumed to derive directly from a form Debria or Dobria, and to be identical with the Welsh word deifr, waters. This leads us to suppose that the district got its name from the many rivers that meet in its south-western corner; and the reader may compare the following line in Arinbiorn's Lay:—i Ioforvîk úrgom hiarli, "over the wet land of York." (Vigfusson and Powell's "Corpus Poeticum Boreale," i., pp. 272, 538.)

DEMETÆ, p. 81. The name is of unknown meaning; the district is called in Modern Welsh Dyved, written Dyfed; besides the personal name Dimet, in the Nennian Pedigrees, we have the genitive Demeti in an early inscription near Haverfordwest: see Rhys's "Lect. on Welsh Phil.," p. 277.

DERVENTIO, p. 39. Names of this kind were once very common, and became in Welsh literature Derwennydd: their etymon is also possibly represented by the Welsh word derw, oak.

DEVA, p. 68. This word originally denoted the river or rather the goddess of the river, for Deva is only the feminine corresponding to a masculine dēvo-s, a god ; but, when the old terminations were dropped, dēvos and dēva assumed the same form, and this, according to rule, yielded in Old Welsh doiu or duiu : later it was written dwyw, as in dwywol, divine, which is now dwyfol, of the same meaning. The semi-vowel was either dropped or made into v (written f) : so Modern Welsh has meudwy, a hermit, meaning literally (like the Irish céle dé or Culdee) God's slave, and the river is Dyfrdwy, rarely Dyfrdwyf, which means the goddess's water. In the Harleian MS. 3859 we find this river mentioned at fol. 195 a, as a part of the boundary of the dominion of Cunedda and his Sons,—“Hic est terminus eorum a flumine quod vocatur dubr diu. Usque ad aliud flumen tebi.” In another version, inaccurately printed in the “Lives of the Cambro-Brit. SS.” (pp. 97–101), it is similarly called dubyr dwiv. How Deva came to be the name of Chester or the Castra Legionis (whence the Welsh Caer Leon, Chester) is not clear ; possibly it was at first the camp Ad Devam, or “by the Dee,” just as another station was called Ad Ansam ; but for the camp of the legion on the Dee, Ptolemy, at any rate, had a distinct name, consisting of the derivative Dēvana, though he was somewhat wide of the mark in his idea of the position of the place.

DICALIDONÆ, pp. 94, 166. See Δουηκαληδόνας.

DIVICIACOS, p. 31. The name appears in some of the manuscripts of Cæsar as Diviciacus, and Gaulish coins prove that to have been the correct Latin form : it is of the same origin, doubtless, as the Gaulish name Divico (Cæsar de Bell. Gall., i. 13).

DOBUNNI, p. 29. This name occurs in the genitive singular as that of a man mentioned on an early-inscribed stone at Tavistock : see "Lect. on Welsh Phil.," p. 400.

DOMNOCOVEROS, DOMNOVEROS, p. 40. The difference between these two terms was probably one of form alone, domnoco being a derivative from domno : see the remarks on Duroliþons, where a possibly parallel case is mentioned. Compare also Cantiori (for early Cantiorix) and Cantorix (Welsh Phil., pp. 369, 397). The domno of Domnoveros, more usually dumno or dubno, is probably the same word as the O. Irish domun, world ; but it is possible that it meant the smaller world of the tribe before meaning the world in a wider sense. That this was the case seems to be favoured by its fitting into the place of cassi in such names as Cassivelaunos, by the side of which we have Dubnovelaunos : compare also Dumnorix, which seems synonymous with Toutiorix, Welsh, Tudri, king of the tribe or of the people. The second element, vero-s, in Domno-vero-s, is probably the word for man, Welsh gwr, O. Irish fer, Latin vir. So it is possible that Domnoveros meant the man of the people ; but the point cannot be established by means of our present data.

Δουηκαληδόσιος, p. 166. This form is particularly interesting, as showing the Celtic pronunciation of the feminine numeral, which appears in the MSS. of Am. Marcellinus, as the di of his Dicalidonæ : in Modern Welsh it is dwy, and in Irish, dí, Sanskrit dve, two. Thus far of the form of the word : when it is asked what was meant by the two Caledonias which this term implied, two answers may be given : possibly the two portions of the country, as divided by the River Ness and the lochs connected with it, were intended ; but it is more probable that the division was then regarded as made by the mountain chains as in later times, and this at one period probably coincided fairly well with the racial one into Celts and Picts.

DUBNOVELAUNOS, p. 27. The forms in the Ancyra inscription are incomplete, both in the Greek and the Latin versions: the former still shows ΔΟΜ//Ο///-ΛΛΑΥΝΟΣ, which was probably Δομνοβέλλαυνος, with the Greek softened β for the Celtic v. This would explain why the Latin is found to read DVMNO-BELLA////, and it is a good instance of the utter impossibility of saying, from the use of Latin b in foreign names, whether v or b was the sound meant. See Iverna and Trinovantes; also Domnoveros and Cassivelaunos.

DUMNONII, pp. 43, 154, 160. There were two peoples so called, the one in the south-west of the island, and the other in the north. The latter are frequently called Damnonii, but their real name is clearly identical with that of the other, as two Roman inscriptions exist, in which the northern Dumnonii are referred to as Civitas Dumnon and Civitas Dumni ("Corpus Inscr. Lat.," vii. Nos. 775, 776), the latter of which would seem to stand for a genitive plural Dumnionum, with a nominative singular Dumnio, while the Welsh Dyfnaint, Devon, appears to represent a form like Dumnuntiorum, a gen. which occurs in one of the MSS. of the Antonine Itinerary. It is quite possible that these names are derived from the same word, domno-s, which we have already mentioned; and another explanation may, perhaps, be supplied by the Welsh word dwfn (for an older dumn-, or dubn-), deep. But it is remarkable that the southern and the northern Dumnonii occupied districts each of which bordered on two seas; and it has been suggested that their name refers to that circumstance, but it is exceedingly doubtful.

DUMNORIX, p. 40. See Domnoveros and Dubnovelaunos.

DUNION, p. 217. If it be not an accident that the MSS. of Ptolemy read Δούνιον and not Δοῦνον, the i of the former is of importance, as showing that we have here to do with a form differing from the Gallo-Brythonic dūnon, which makes in Welsh din, a fort or town. It could be explained only by the O. Irish word dún, genitive dúne of the same meaning. Now dún has been ascertained to represent an early neuter stem in es, nominative dūnos, genitive dunesos, which, when the s disappeared, would be dūneo, liable to become dūnio. This last may be compared with the latio of an early inscription in South Wales, which would be the rule-right equivalent of the Latin genitive lateris (Rhys's "Lect. on Welsh Phil.," p. 398). From dune or duni, which would thus be the base for the oblique cases, nothing would be more natural than for the word, seeing that it was neuter, to take the form Δούνιον and dunium, in the writings of Greek and Latin authors, in case it had not been Brythonicized into dunon before reaching them. The Peutinger Table gives the name of a town fifteen miles from Isca Dumnoniorum as Ridumo, to be read as an ablative Ridunio; but the name is probably incomplete, and it is proposed to take it as standing for Moridunio, and as indicating the town of Seaton, a name which is a literal rendering of the Celtic one; for Moridunio would mean the sea-fort, and that was probably also the name of Carmarthen on the tidal part of the Towy, though it is only called Maridunon by Ptolemy.

DUROLIPONS, p. 227. This has been supposed to have been situated at one of the three places, Ramsay, Cambridge, or Huntingdon. The Antonine Itinerary gives it in the ablative as Duroliponte, so that there cannot be a doubt that the Romans thought they detected in the name their word pons, a bridge;

but it is quite possible that this was only a guess ; and it is remarkable that the next station in the Itinerary has the name Durobrivæ, which, seeing that briv- meant a bridge (being, in fact, the Celtic cognate of that English word, An.-Saxon brycg, just as Welsh uwy is in English egg), would have had, practically, the same meaning as Durolipons, for duroli would have to be regarded as a derivative from duro ; and Durobriv-æ is all but the same name as that mentioned in another route as Durocobriv-is, with a derivative duroco by the side of duro: compare Domnoveros and Domnocoveros. So it is quite possible that the Romans were mistaken, and that the name in question is to be divided Durolipons, with the same lip as in the personal name Cunalipi, a genitive in an early inscription recently discovered in Carnarvonshire. As to the other element duro, so often met with in Celtic names of places in Britain and Gaul, it appears to mean door, gate, or porch, and to be of the same origin as the Welsh dōr and drws, Irish dorus, a door, and the English word and its congeners. Duroco in Durocobrivis is probably the same word as the highly interesting avorico of a Gaulish inscription, in which it seems to have meant some kind of a portico (De Belloguet's "Ethnogénie Gauloise," i. p. 300). But, though the etymology of duro in Celtic names is tolerably clear, it is not very evident what it exactly meant : did it refer mostly to the gates or entrances of strongholds, or to those of temples, as in the case of the Gaulish Iron-Door mentioned in the life of Eugendus (Act. SS., Jan. 1, vol. i., p. 50, and "Lect. on Welsh Phil.," p. 26)? Lastly, the etymology of the word suggests the possibility of some of the duro names being of the same kind as Forum Julii, Forum Voconii, and the like in Gaul, Spain, and Italy.

DUOTRIGES, pp. 20, 217. The meaning of the name is obscure, but the compound would seem to resolve itself into Duro- and trig-es: it is remarkable, however, that the name seems to admit of being equated with that of the Irish people called Dart-raighi, who have left their name to Dartry, in the county of Leitrim.

EBUDÆ, p. 223. This name has been so treated in later times that it has passed through Hebudes into Hebrides, and attached itself to the islands north-west of Scotland.

ECENI, p. 28, see Cenimagni.

EPATICCOS, p. 26. This name seems derived from the Gallo-Brythonic word for a horse, which must have been epo-s, whence the Welsh ebol, a colt; but the unexplained termination, with its double c, reminds one of Boudicca.

EPEIACON, p. 227. The affix ac would give the name the force of a word meaning a place abounding in, or in some way associated with, that which is denoted by the preceding syllables. The base, which we have here as epei, would imply a noun epei-os, -a, or -on derived from epo-s, a horse; but whether the derivative meant some kind of a horse, or a horseman, is impossible to decide. The word Vereda (of which Voreda, the other form in the MSS., would be a somewhat later one) also referred to horses, as it cannot be severed from the Welsh word gorwydd, a horse, which would imply a masculine veredos. Possibly, while veredos was a horse, a feminine vereda meant a collection of horses or cavalry. Compare the Greek, ἵππος, horse, and ἡ ἵππος, cavalry. Veredos is the word which became in Late-Latin veredus, whence the hybrid paraveredus, the original of palfrey and the German pferd, a horse.

EPPILLOS, p. 23. It is remarkable that in this name the p appears always double, which can hardly be deemed etymological, as it is probably a derivative from epo-s. The double l in such names seem to stand for l plus j (the semi-vowel y). Epillos would be exactly the Welsh word ebill, an auger, a chisel, the key of a harp, though literally it ought to mean a little horse.

GALLI, pp. 2, 266. Here the double l is of the same origin as in Eppillos and Allobrox: the nominative singular would be Gallos for Galjos from gal, which is a word met with in Irish used in the sense of valour. The feminine Gallia is probably of Roman creation.

GANGANI, p. 233. Ptolemy mentions the headland of the Gangani as Γαγγανῶν ἄκρον, and this is to be traced later in Pentir Ganion, or the headland of Gation, the home of a Goidel, mentioned in a passage in the "Mabinogion" (ii. pp. 208, 209), where he is spoken of under the title of arderchawg Prydein, or prince of Prydein. Here Prydein stands, as elsewhere not unfrequently for Prydyn or Pictland, and so the name must have been once applicable to a part of Carnarvonshire. Besides the Pictish Gangani of Wales, Ptolemy places a people of the same name in the west of Ireland. I should gather from the Welsh Ganion that the early form was Gangnanes or Gangnones.

GERONTIOS, p. 96. This is the name which has yielded in Welsh Gercint and Geraint, borne by the man alluded to at p. 109. Compare Ambrosius becoming Emreis, though more commonly Emrys. A simpler form of the same origin as Gerontios occurs in the Irish gerat or gerait, a champion.

ICTIS, pp. 42, 45 : see Itius.

ITIUS, p. 14. According to Holder, whose recent edition of Cæsar de Bello Gallico (Freiburg, 1882) will prove very valuable to the student of Celtic names, the reading of the manuscripts is Portum Itium in both the passages (v. 2 and 5) where it occurs. We are, however, of opinion that the original name was not Itium, but Ictium, and that the whole English Channel was called Mare Ictium, or Ictian Sea. In that case Portus Ictius would designate Cæsar's place of embarkation, somewhat in the same way that Dover might in English be termed the Channel Harbour. The former probably had a Gaulish name of its own, which may have become the Latin one also as soon as the Romans began to be a little more at home in the north of Gaul; so that it would be labour in vain to try to detect Ictius in any place-name still current on the French coast. We infer the term Mare Ictium, or Ictian Sea, from the fact that the Irish used to call it Muir n-Icht, or the Sea of Icht, which was probably a pre-Brythonic name, like Albion or Alban. It is, however, not to be supposed that it had anything to do with the name of the Isle of Wight, Welsh Gwyth, for an older Vectis: this last might possibly become Ficht in the mouth of a Goidel, but not Icht. On the other hand, the Ictis of Diodorus Siculus (v. 22) would just meet the case; and it was the same island, doubtless, that Timæus, who was fond of quoting from the travels of Pytheas, is supposed to have called Mictis. The passage has come down to us only in Pliny's "Natural History" (iv. 30), where the words are insulam mictim: the presence of the second m is surely due to carelessness or caprice on the part of a copyist. An instructive article on the British peninsulas which were islands at high tide, has been published, with plans, by Mr. A. Tylor, in "Nature," vol. xxix., pp. 84-6.

IVERNA, p. 265. Dr. Neubauer, who looked for the graffito not long ago, found that it had been effaced by the weather ; but a few years before it was carefully examined by the Rev. John Wordsworth, who has kindly communicated the following reading to me:—Bassus Cherronesiia et Tertius Hadrumetinus et Concessus Iverna. The names appear to be those of three slaves, and the fact that the one from Ireland was called Concessus is remarkable ; for, though that name seems to have been uncommon in Britain, it can be matched by a Concessa, to the use of which in this country we have testimony in the later form Conchess, the traditional name of St. Patrick's mother. Concessus, Concessa, Concessanus, and the like, were by no means unusual names in other parts of the Roman world ; but the only form of this group known in the Roman inscriptions of Britain is Concessinius on a stone found at Hexham (vii. No. 481).

MÆTÆ, pp. 92, 157, 161, 170. The name, as it occurs in Reeves's "Adamnan's Life of St. Columba" is Miati and Miathi. The meaning of the word is unknown, but there is no reason whatever to think that it has anything to do with the Goidelic word mag, a plain or field, as some take for granted, who have no notion of perspective in phonology. In Celtic, it is probably connected with the Welsh meiddio, to dare.

MAGLOCUNOS, p. 122. This name has been successively softened down into Mailcon or Mailcun, and Maelgwn, wrongly written Maelgwyn. It is not to be confounded with the Irish Maelchon, for Brythonic maglo, is in Irish mál, a prince or hero, while Irish mael, a tonsured (slave), is in Welsh moel, bald or bare. The elements of this compound also made a name Cunomaglos: the genitive Conomagli occurs ("Lect. on Welsh Phil," p. 369), and the Modern Welsh is Cynvael. The accentuation would seem from the modern forms to have once been Maglocúnos and Cunomáglos, a supposition which is confirmed by the doubling of the

I in such Irish forms as Conall of the same composition as the Welsh Cynwal, and represented by the Cunovali of an inscription found in Cornwall (Hübner's "Inscr. Brit. Christ.," No. 2).

MAPONOS, p. 228. The monument to Apollo Maponos, found at Hexham, stands about four feet high, and the lettering is said to be of the finest description; but there are two other inscriptions which refer to this god. The one was found in the parish of Ainstable, in Cumberland (vii. No. 332), while the other had been cut on a fine piece of sculpture, made pro salute of the persons concerned, and discovered at Ribchester, near Blackburn, in Lancashire (vii. No. 218). The name Maponos or Mabon is derived from mapo-s, in Old Welsh map, now mab, a boy, a youth, a son, and is formed like Welsh guron, a hero, from gwr, a man. Mabon means a boy, and is best understood by looking at the Greek representations of Apollo, according to which he was ever young and vigorous, and by calling to mind that in Irish mythology the Ultonian hero Cúchulainn was always beardless, which his admirers of the other sex sometimes excused by pretending to believe that he was young. Beside the youth of Maponos and his concern for the health and safety of his worshippers, we learn the following things of him as the Mabon of the "Mabinogion":—He was a great hunter, who had a wonderful hound, and he rode on a steed swift as a sea-wave; when he was three nights old he was stolen from between his mother and the wall, no one knew whither; numberless ages afterwards it was ascertained by Arthur that he was in a stone prison at Gloucester, uttering heart-rending groans and undergoing treatment with which Apollo's bondage in the house of Admetus could not compare; Arthur and his men succeeded in releasing him to engage in the great hunt of Twrch Trwyth, which could not take place without him ("Mabinogion," ii. pp. 225-6, 234-5, 286-7, 300-1). Lastly, he is always called son of Modron, which was the name of his mother. Now Modron implies a stem modr, the reflex of the Latin mater, Eng. mother; moreover, it is the exact equivalent of the Gaulish word Matrōna, the name of the river (more correctly perhaps of the goddess of the river) now called the Marne. Apollo and Leto or Latona, with the corresponding Celtic duad Mabon and Modron, suggest the interesting question, how far the place of the Madonna and Infant Jesus in Greek and Latin Christianity had been prepared for them by the paganism that went before. Welsh hagiology has very little to say about saints of the name of Mabon: it is quite possible that one or another of them is simply Apollo Maponos in a Christian garb. From the order in which Maponi comes in the lists of British places given by the anonymous Ravennas, his temple would appear to have been somewhere in the south of Scotland or the north of England.

ORDOVICES, pp. 81, 218. The plural Ordovices seems to be an adjectival formation from a simpler word Ordovo-s, which is Latinized into Ordous in Corbalengi's epitaph: the plural would be Ordovi, which we seem to have in the name of a farmhouse, near Rhyl, in Flintshire, to wit, Rhyd Orddwy or the ford of the Ordovi. The further advance of the Ordovices is also marked by the strong position, now called Dinorwig in the neighbourhood of Carnarvon, having, as it seems, formerly been called Dinorddwig, the fortress of the Ordovices: see Duppa's "Johnson's Tour in N. Wales," p. 198, where it is spelt Dinorrdwig. But still more significant is the fact learned from the fragment on boundaries in the "Iolo MSS," pp. 86, 477, which gives the district between the Dovey and Gwynedd the name Cantref Orddwyf or the Hundred of the Ordovi: I have not succeeded in tracing [the original, which Iolo calls a book of Mr. Cobb's of Cardiff; but it speaks for the genuineness of the tract, that neither he nor his son, who undertook the translation into English, understood it; and the addition of f to Orddwy, as it were after the analogy of Dyfrdwyf, is probably due to the father. The district appears to have got to be called Y Cantref or the Hundred par excellence, so that the distinctive word Orddwy ceased to be repeated. Others would explain these names by means of the Welsh word gorddwy, violence or oppression; but violence was so general in former days as considerably to disqualify the word for topographical use. The etymon is probably to be found in the Welsh word gordd, a hammer or sledge-hammer, which was in Old Welsh ord as it has always been in Irish. The Ordovices were originally the hammerers, and the kind of hammer meant was probably the formidable axe-hammer of stone, of which specimens have been found in different localities in Britain: archæologists believe it to have been meant for war and used down into the Iron Age.

PENNOCRUCION, p. 228. This name consists of penno-s, head or top, crucio-, which became in Welsh crüc, now crüg, a heap or mound; the whole would mean the top or head of the mound or barrow, or possibly the top mound. It is now Penkrige, and an intermediate form Pencrik occurs in an eighth century charter of Æthilhard of Wessex: see Kemble's "Codex Diplomaticus," No. lxxvi. Pencrik represents the Welsh pronunciation, which would then have been Pencrüc, and is now Pencrug (as in the case of a hill near Llandovery in South Wales), just as nearly with regard to the narrow ū as Bæda's Dinoof does the personal name, which in his time was Dūnōt, later Dunawd, being no other than the Latin Donatus in a Welsh form. The English having afterwards made Pencrik into Penkridge, nothing was more natural than to divide it in the wrong place into Penk-ridge: hence it is that the river close by is said to be called the Penk. Mr. Stokes suggests a connexion with the name of the chief idol of ancient Érin, which is called Cenn Crúaich in the "Tripartite Life of St. Patrick," Rawlinson, B. 512, fol. 22^a 2.

PETUARIA, pp. 39, 228. This would be the word for fourth, agreeing with a feminine noun which is not given: the exact modern equivalent is the Welsh pedwaredd, quarta, which suggests that the old form was pronounced petwarija.

REMI, p. 29. Remi was the name of the leading Belgic people, and it would seem to be of the same origin as the Welsh word rhwyf, a king, Irish riam, before, and the Latin primus, first; compare the English first and the German fürst, a prince. The name of the Remi would thus be of the same flattering description as that of the Caturiges and others.

SCITLIVISSI, p. 252. Now and then Irish resolves its compound terms: thus, a field for athletic games is called cluchimag, or sport-field, but also mag in cluchi, or field of the sport; and both forms are found very near one another in the "Book of the Dun," namely, at 59a, 59b, 60a, and 60b. Similarly in the case of scitliviss- we have nowhere else met with the compound, but we would identify it with the resolved term in the same manuscript, fol. 55b, where it occurs as fis scél. Here viss- and fis are to be regarded as meaning knowledge, and as being of the same origin as the Irish verb fess, "was known," fissi, "sciendum," and the English word wise. The rest, scitl- and scél, meant a story, news, or tidings: compare so-scéle, good news, gospel. The Welsh equivalent is chweal, for an older chwetl of the same meaning as the Irish scél. The two taken together prove the common Celtic stem to have once been sqvetl. If this last is to be treated as standing for s(e)qvetl, as suggested by Prof. Zimmer, we have to do with a word of the same origin as the English say, the German sagen, and Norse saga. The reduction by the Goidels of original sqv to sc, and by the Brythons to sv (whence Welsh chw) may prove of some use in distinguishing between the Celts of the two branches of the family; for we have it in other Welsh words, such as chwydu, to vomit, Irish sceith, cy-chwyn, to start, Irish, scind, flew, sprang, started; and chwalu, to scatter or disperse, Irish, scailim (wrongly written scáilim), "I let loose, scatter, or disperse": compare the Scotch verb to skail, said of a congregation dispersing at the end of a meeting, exactly in the same way as hwalu in the Welsh of Cardiganshire. There remains the question of meanings, for while scitlivissi in the inscription referred to a man, fis scél meant news or information,—literally, knowledge of news or intelligence of tidings. So it may be surmised that scitliviss- might mean either a message or a messenger, news or a bringer of news. We need go no further than the passage referred to for a somewhat parallel case; for there Maive says: ráncatar mo thechta-sa cotucsat fis scél dam-sa ass, "my scouts have gone and brought me news from there." Here techta, scouts, is the plural of techt, a messenger or scout; but the latter is also the same word as the verbal noun techt, the act of going. Compare the Welsh feminine cennad, which means not only a messenger, but also a message of permission or leave; still better known is the double meaning of the Latin word nuncius.

SEGANTII, p. 220. The alternative Setantii is given in Ptolemy's Geography, and, similarly, the name of the river is either Segeia or Seteia: probably the former is to be preferred, as of the same origin as other genuine old names such as that of the Segontiac Hercules at Silchester, and of the people called—SEGONTIACI, p. 17, who came to make peace with Cæsar. To them must also be added the name of the Roman fortress near Carnarvon, called Segontion, which is made in Welsh into Seiont, and even into Saint in the name of the river flowing by. The syllable seg in these words is probably of the same origin as the German sieg, victory, and its congeners, and Segeia was most likely not so much the name of the river as of the divinity of the river. If, as Mr. Henry Bradley suggests, the Dee was meant, the name would appear still more appropriate: see Deva.

SELGOVÆ, p. 220. This is explained by the Irish word selg, hunting, the chase, as in coin seilge, a pack of hounds, Welsh cwn hela: the Old Welsh imperative for hunt was helgha, now helia and hela.

SENOTIGIRNOS, p. 41. No coin gives more than Seno in one part and tigir (or tigip) in another. Senotigirnos would be in Welsh hen-dëyrn, from hen, old, O. Irish, sen-; and tëyrn, a lord or prince, Irish tigern and tigerna, lord.

SILURES, pp. 42, 81. The origin and meaning of this word are utterly unknown, but it is worth while noting that the name of the chief man connected with the temple of Nodens at Lydney Park on the western bank of the Severn in the country of the Silures has been there read SILVLANVS (Berlin, "Corpus Inscr. Brit. Lat.," No. 140), and that there is no need to make it into Silvianus or Silvanus: it should rather be read Silulanus, silul- being equated with the silur- of the word Silures. Probably the name given by Solinus as that of an island, Silura, whether he meant the land of the Silures or the Scilly Isles, is of the same origin. Sulpicius Severus, however, who flourished about the end of the fourth century, leads us to infer that the Scilly Islands did bear a name cognate with that of the Silures, for, in his "Chronica" (ed. Halm), ii. 51, he uses the words, in Sylinancim insulam, quæ ultra Britannias sita est, deportatus, and again, in Sylinancim insulam datus. The MS. which gives this reading is of the eleventh century, but the editors go their own way and print "Sylinam insulam." Sylinancis is not an easy form to deal with, but it seems to be the only one attested, and it is possibly derived from some such a one as Silulancis, with the same silul as Situlanus. Some form of this name of the islands must have been in use when the Danes began to call them Syllingar, or Syllings, with which may be compared a passage in W. Smith's "Particular Description of England, 1588" (London, 1879), in which he speaks, p. 60, of "the Isles of Sorlingues, commonly called "The Sillies."

TÆXALI, pp. 163, 232. The headland of the same name is called Ταίξαλον ἄκρον in Ptolemy's Geography, and I am persuaded that the Trucculensis Portus mentioned by Tacitus (Agr., 38) meant a place on the same part of the coast; but it is impossible to say which of the two, Tæxal- or Truccul-, makes the nearest approach to the real name meant to be reproduced. The fleet may have wintered at Keith Inch, the small island at Peterhead.

TASCIOVANS, p. 26. Some of the various forms of the genitive on the coins are TASCIOVANI, TASCIOVANII, TASCIOVANTIS, together with such abbreviations as Tasciov, Tasciav, Tascio, Tascia, Taxcia, Taxci. The double I is probably to be read E, which is found to be one of the ways of representing the semivowel j (y in yes) in such Gaulish names as Οὐλλόρειος and the like; the vowel ε being perhaps the nearest approach to the semi-vowel which Greek spelling suggested. That this can, however, have been the value of the II at the end of TASCIOVANII is doubtful; it probably argues a genitive corresponding to a nominative Tascjovanjos. Whether the x in some of these forms had any value different from s is also doubtful; but the use here of x reminds one of the name of the Cantian king whom Cæsar calls Taximagulus. The meaning of the word tascjo is not known, but it may be provisionally taken to be that of battle-array or the like. The other syllable, van or vant, is probably to be connected with the Welsh gwan-u, to pierce or stab, to spear. The hesitation between Tascjovan- and Tascjavan- shows that the formative vowel was but slightly pronounced, and ready to disappear; the old inscriptions of Wales give parallels in such names as Senomagli and Senemagli, Trenegussi and Trenagusu, &c.

TINCOMMOS, p. 23. This name looks as if compounded of Commios and another element, tin, which is possibly the same word as the Welsh preposition, tàn, as in tan y fainc, under the bench, tan y foru, till to-morrow, literally, "under or up to the morrow." One cannot help identifying with this the Latin tenus, as far as, up to, and connecting the Irish word tánaise, second, also the tanist or heir apparent in Goidelic succession. Thus Tincommios was not only a son of Commios, but he bore a name meaning a "second Commios," a man like Commios, or Commios's representative. This would place the name within a well-known category of Welsh epithets or surnames with eil or ail, second, as in Morvran eil Tegid, and Cadwallawn eil Cadfan, "Cadwallon, second-Cadvan," —Cadvan was his father (see the “Mabinogion,” ii. 206, and Gee’s “Myv. Arch.,” p. 408, triad 80). Tin-commios did not stand alone, for the name accompanying that of Dubnovelaunos on the Augustus monument at Ancyra begins with Tim or Tin, and such Welsh names as Tyssul and Tyssilio may be for Tyn-sul and Tyn-silio; nor is it improbable that such a Gaulish name as Tessignius or Teddicius stands for an earlier Tensignios, while the same initial element without the s is to be detected in the feminine Tenigenonia, of the same origin, and occurring in an inscription from Cisalpine Gaul (“Corp. Inscr.,” v. No. 3345). These forms would have to be interpreted after the analogy of such Latin names as Secundinus, Secundianus, Secundillus, &c.

TOGODUMNOS, p. 35. At first compound names doubtless had a definite and clear meaning; but, for the purpose of multiplying those with a common element in the same family they were manipulated freely, as in the case of a Carmarthenshire inscription commemorating Barrivendi, son of Vendubar[r]i: compare the Greek Δωρόθεος and Θεόδωρος, “Ἰππαρχος” and “Ἀρχιππος,” and many more; also the An-Saxon royal names. Perhaps in this case the compound Togodumnos was suggested by another Dumnotogos: the latter, according to what was surmised under Domnoveros, would mean the protection of the people or the defender of the state, togo being of the same origin as O. Welsh to, a cover or roof, Irish tuige, and the English thatch, German dach, Latin tegere, to cover, to protect. Cogidumnos would have to be explained similarly, cogi being possibly the word which is in Mod. Welsh cae, a fastening of any kind, such as a brooch, a hedge, and thence also a field. It is probably of the same origin (as well as meaning) as the English hedge, German hag.

TRINOVANTES, p. 17. It is hard to decide whether we should write Trinovantes or Trinobantes, but Tasciovanus's name, together with Ptolemy's Τρινόαντες, inclines us to prefer the former. In trino we seem to have the Welsh word trin, a battle or conflict, which enters into the proper name Tringad, the Trenacatus of a Cardiganshire inscription. The whole word Trinovantes would then mean battle-stabbers, or battle-spearers: we use these English compounds because we do not know what the exact meaning may have been; but a sort of distinction, possibly here in point, seems to be indicated by the name Trenacatus a battle-warrior, and Dunocatus a fortress-warrior.

TRUCCULENSIS or TRUTULENSIS, p. 89. See Tæxali.

UXELODUNON, p. 232. Uxelodunon is found written mostly with ll, which is, however, contrary to the evidence of the living words, Welsh, uchel, high; Irish, uasal, high-born, noble. But on a bronze cup this name, which should be in the ablative, is found engraved VXELODVMC, and it is best explained by supposing that the spelling meant to be written was Uxelodunio ("Corpus Insc. Lat.," vii. No. 1291). The anonymous geographer of Ravenna wrote Uxelludamo, which in its m bears witness to an ni, while the MSS. of the Notitia Dignitatum make for one l, as they read Axeloduno and Axdoduno. As to dunon being Brythonic, and dunion more Goidelic than Brythonic, see Dunion. In either case the compound would mean the high town or the lofty fortress.

UXELLA, UXELLON, p. 232. These may be either inaccurately written for Uxela, Uxelon, which would be the adjectives in the feminine and neuter singular, agreeing with nouns not given; or else they may be derived forms, standing for Uxelja, Uxeljon. The stem uxel-, meaning high, is the same as that of the Greek ὑψηλός, high, and both are probably from the same root as the English word up, but the Celts have changed the labial into a guttural, as in Irish secht, "septem." Greek, however, has no parallel to ὑψηλός, but the Celts have one in the Welsh adjective isel, Irish, ísel, low, from the old preposition in (in Mod. Welsh yn), of the same origin and meaning as the English in and the Latin in, which in its derivative imus (for inmus ?), lowest, comes to the same meaning as the Welsh superlative of isel, to wit, isaf, lowest, the comparative being is, lower. This element enters possibly into the name of the Insubres, and of the British towns of Isurion and Isubrigantion. The s of the stems up-s and in-s implied in the Greek and Celtic words raises an interesting question which cannot be discussed here.

VACOMAGI, p. 162. It has been suggested to us that this name is an approximate reproduction of a Celtic compound meaning the inhabitants of the open plains, as contrasted with the adjoining tract covered by the Caledonian Forest. In that case vac- is to be equated with the Welsh word gwag "empty," and mag- with Welsh ma, Irish magh, "a plain or open field."

VENETI, p. 9. The word is most likely of the same origin as the Anglo-Saxon wine, a friend, and meant allies: the Irish fine, a tribe or sept, is most likely related, and so may be the Welsh Gwynedd; but the latter is inseparable from Gwyndod, which is of the same meaning. They probably represent an early form Venedas, genitive Venedātos or Venedōtos, Gwynedd being from the nominative, and Gwyndod from the stem of the oblique cases. Venedōtos is made in Latin into Venedōtis in an inscription at Penmachno, near Bettws y Coed: Hübner's Inscr. Brit. Christ., No. 135. The Veneti have left their name to the part of Brittany called by the Bretons Guened, Vannes, and it is this name probably that laid the foundation for the tales which trace an army of Kymry from Gwynedd to Guened.

VEREDA, p. 228 : see Epeiacon.

VERGOBRETOS, p. 59. The analysis of the compound would suggest an adjective qualifying the name of the magistrate, and meaning efficax iudicii, working or executing judgment. For the first part, vergo, seems identical with the Old Breton word guerg "efficax," and akin to Welsh, cy-weirio, to mend, to dress, or put in working order, Irish, do-airc-i or tairci "efficit, parat," a verb of the same origin and conjugation as the Greek πέζω, ἔρδω, I do or make, Gothic vaurkjan, to work. The other part breto- is identical with the Welsh bryd, mind, intention, ded-fryd, a verdict; Irish, breth, judgment, brithem, genitive brithemon, a judge, Anglicised brehon. All these words are connected with the root ber, to bear, and the standing Irish law phrase for giving judgment is to "bear a breth," which literally means to bear a bearing, or bear a birth, and seems to point to some kind of supposed inspiration, brought about in a way similar, perhaps, to that whereby the Irish druids were believed to obtain visions of things to come. See Cormac's Glossary, s. v. imbas forosnai, and O'Donovan's "Battle of Magh Rath," pp. 46, 47, also Scott's "Lady of the Lake," canto iv. 5.

VERTURIONES, pp. 94, 222. This is usually written Vecturiones, which we tried in vain to understand, but on converting it into Goidelic, according to the usual rules of phonology, we found that it would yield Fechtrenn or Fochtrenn, which at once suggested a real name Fortrenn. On turning to Eyssenhardt's edition of Amm. Marcellinus, we were delighted to find that Vecturiones only comes from Gelenius, who lived in the sixteenth century, and that it has no manuscript authority whatever. The name is of the same origin as Verteræ, mentioned as one of the places where the Dux Britanniarum had some of his men quartered. It is found to have been at Brough-under-Stanmore, in Westmoreland; and Brough (i.e. burh, a fortress) is a translation, probably, of Verteræ, for the latter is represented in Welsh by the word gwerthyr, a fortification, and Y Werthyr occurs as the name of a house in Anglesey, situated near the remains of considerable earthworks and a large cromlech, also of another in the parish of Llangian in Lley. Mr. Stokes has pointed out to us the Sanskrit equivalent in vartra, a dyke, German werder, an embankment. The Chronicles usually speak only of the Plain of Fortrenn or of the Men of Fortrenn; so Fortrenn, which is a genitive, is almost the only case of the word which they give: the nominative in its old form would probably have been Fortriu or Foirtriu, later Foirtre, while the dative should, according to analogy, have the optional forms Fortrinn, which Mr. Stokes has met with, and Fortriu like the nominative. This latter is possibly to be detected in the obscure place-name Foircu in Todd's "Irish Nennius," p. 148; but Mr. Skene, in his "Chron. of the Picts and Scots," p. 43, prints it Foirciu, which may well have been somebody's misreading of Foirtriu, seeing that tri would usually be found contracted into a t (easily confounded with c) with an i written above it. The whole line is, O chrich Chath co Foirciu, which has been rendered "from the region of Cat to Forchu," whereby Mr. Skene understands Scotland from Caithness to the Forth. In Old Irish co governs the accusative and not the dative.

VICTORIA, p. 160. Such a name could hardly have been expected beyond the limits of the Roman province, and it is, perhaps, worth the while to suggest that it was possibly an approximate reproduction only of a native one which it bore. Then the question comes, what the latter may have been. Evidently a repetition of Verteræ would hardly fit, and we cannot postulate a form Vertōria or Virtōria; but there seems to be no serious reason why we should not assume it to have been Vërtūria or else Vertūrio, the singular, in point of formation, of the plural Veturiones. Such a vocable would probably be sufficiently like Victoria in sound to have induced the Romans to treat it as the Latin word. The Sanskrit and German vartra and werder forbid our postulating Vercturia, which would approach still nearer, as well as supply an excuse for Gelenius writing Veturiones.

VRICONION, pp. 232, 308. Ptolemy's Geography gives Ουροκόμιον, and the Itinerary has, among others, the forms viroconio, uiriconio, uriconio, urioconio, and uriocunio; but when we take into account the modern name, which is Wroxeter, and that of the neighbouring height, which is called the Wrekin, the preference must be given to uriconio, and the Celtic name represented must be regarded as having been not Uriconion, but Vriconion. It may have meant a spot where rods and saplings grew, while it should in modern Welsh be Gwrygon, which we doubtless have in the Caer Guricon of Nennius. Gwrygon or Guricon appears to have originally been the name of the district in which that caer or town stood, and it has been pointed out to us that it is called Ureconn, that is to say, Wreconn, in a poem in the Red Book of Hergest. It refers to another fortress situated there, called Dinlle Ureconn, whereby it was meant probably to be distinguished from the Dinlle near the Menai Straits: see Skene's "Four An. Books of Wales," ii. p. 288.

INDEX.

-
- | | |
|---|--|
| ADAMNAN, 72, 91, 157, 167,
242, 269, 300 Aððedomaros, 36, 277, 278 Adminius, 34, 278 Adrian, Pope, 241 Aed Finn, 178, 179 Aedan, 156, 157, 159, 170, 175 Aedui, 38, 40, 59 Aenach, Ir., 65 Aerven, 68 Æschylus, 203 Æternus, 118 Æthelfrith, 114, 126, 129, 132 Æthelstán, 109, 186 Æthelweard, 144 Æthilhard, 304 Agricola, 86-90, 162, 165,
227, 244, 256 Agrippa, M. Mænius, 244 Aircol, 256 Airem, 266 Airer Dalriatai, 272 Airer Gaethel, 272 Alauna, 160, 278 Alban, 185, 204, 205 Albion, 202-204 Albiona, 203 Alclyde, 145, 147 Allectus, 93, 238 All-fro, W., 139 Allobrox, 139, 278 Alpin, 174-182, 200 | Alun, 278 Ambiorix, 61 Ambresburh, 107 Ambrosius, 96, 104, 105, 107,
299 Ammianus Marcellinus, 91, 94,
166, 240, 293, 312 Amminus, 34, 278 Ancalites, 17, 28, 29 Anderida, 106 Angus, 175, 195 Anlach, 246 Anlaf Cuaran, 187, 246 Anteðrigus, 37, 38, 279 Antonine It., 228, 232, 294, 296 Antoninus, 90 Antony, 23 Apollo, 19, 33, 67, 228, 290,
301, 302 * Ἀρχιππος, 309 Arderydd, 145, 255 Argyle, 272 Armorica, 226 Arregaethel, 272 Artbranan, 271 Arthur, 73, 108, 135, 234-
237, 302 Arthuret, Knows of, 145 Artorius, 237 Assedomari, 277 Atbret Iudeu, 133 |
|---|--|

- Atecotti, 56, 91, 94, 113, 220, 233, 238, 279
 Atreates, 9, 23-25, 29, 43,
 279, 280
 Augustine, 126
 Augustus Cæsar, 25-27, 33, 206
 Auleri, 287
 Aulus Didius, 83
 Aulus Plautius, 30, 35, 75, 80
 Aurelius Conan, 107
 Avienus, 47, 264

 BADONICUS, MONS, 108
 Bæda, 97, 113, 130-138, 169, 171, 173, 197, 221, 264, 273, 304
 Baetan mac Cairill, 157
 Banatia, 163
 Barrivendi, 309
 Beadwolf, 149
 Belerion, 45, 216, 280
 Belgæ, 42, 79, 280
 Belinos, 290
 Belisama, 68, 280
 Bellovaci, 23
 Bergyon, 203, 284
 Bericos, 37, 38, 76
 Bernicia, 90, 114, 129, 221
 Bernicii, 113, 114
 Berroc, 29
 Beth, 263
 Bibroci, 17, 28, 29
 Biceot, 262
 Biturix, 65, 280
 Blatobulgion, 269, 280, 281
 Boia, 229, 255
 Bol, Cors y, 268
 Bolge, 268
 Bolgyne, 268
 Boresti, 89, 95, 162, 222, 282
 Boudicca, 66, 85, 228, 282, 297
 Bourges, 281
 Boyd Dawkins, Prof., 21, 48, 259

 Boyne, 67, 262
 Bradley, Mr. H., 80, 281, 306
 Bran, 280
 Bran Dub, 281
 Branwen, 280
 Brëennych, 113
 Breiz, 213
 Brennus, 282
 Bret, An.-Sax., 137
 Britain, 206, 289
 Brethonec, 207
 Bperravoi, 206
 Bretwalda, 136, 137
 Brezonek, 207
 Brigantes, 30, 39, 63, 66, 81,
 85, 90, 91, 113, 118, 153,
 219, 221, 282, 283, 288
 Britig, 283
 Britain, 137, 205, 207
 — Lesser, 207
 — Lower, 98, 100
 — Upper, 98, 100, 112, 115
 Britannia, 202, 205, 206, 208, 283
 Briton, 3, 208
 Brittia, 212
 Brittones, 207-209, 212, 282, 287
 Brochvael, 127
 Brough, 313
 Brude, MacMaelchon, 156,
 167, 178, 192, 197, 264, 270
 Brude, son of Bile, 171
 — son of Ungust, 178
 Brychan, 158, 253
 Bryten, An.-Sax., 137
 Brythoneg, 207
 Buddwalan, 286

 CADAVAEL, 133, 134
 Caðði, 29
 Cadoc, 122, 257
 Cadommedd, 133
 Cadvan, 127, 128, 130, 308

- Cadwal, 286
 Cadwaladr, 127, 132, 134, 142, 143, 286
 Cadwallon, 128, 131, 132,
 135-7, 248, 286, 308
 Cæsarians, 135, 138
 CALEDONIA, 88, 283
 Caledonian Forest, 39, 224,
 282, 283
 Calgacos, 89, 227, 283
 Calidones, 165, 230
 Caligula, 34
 Calleva, 24, 29, 283
 Calvus Patricii, 72
 Cambrensis, 144
 Cambria, 140, 141, 143, 144
 Camulodunon, 26, 27, 78, 81,
 85, 106, 283
 Camuloris, 284
 Camulos, 283
 Cangi, 91
 Cantii, 24, 43, 105
 Cantiori, 293
 Caratâcos, 35, 38, 77, 82, 284
 Carausius, 93, 238, 284
 Carbantorigon, 231, 284
 Carini, 223
 Carnoban, 148
 Carnonacæ, 223
 Carron, 159
 Carthach, Ir., 284
 Carthaginians, 5, 47, 48, 51
 Cartismandua, 39, 66, 82, 83, 284
 Cassi, 17, 28, 29, 35, 284
 Cassiterides, 5, 46
 Cassivelaunos, 15-18, 27, 28,
 246, 284, 285, 293
 Castra Exploratorum, 244
 Caswallon, 246, 286
 Catscaul, 132
 Catti, 29, 35, 37, 62, 286
 Caturiges, 30, 286, 304
 Catuvelauni, 15, 20, 26-31,
 35, 36, 38, 77, 78, 285
 Ce, 272
 Ceawlin, 108, 140
 Celtæ, 2, 287
 Celtchar, 283
 Celyddon, 224, 283
 Cenimagni, 17, 28, 287
 Cénwalh, 109
 Cerones, 223, 271
 Cicero, 20, 206
 Cimber, 143
 Cimbri, 279
 Cinaeth, 181-185
 Cinglas, 122
 Claudian, 240
 Claudius Cæsar, 18, 35, 37-39, 43, 76-78
 Clôta, 147
 Clwyd, 86, 147, 291
 Clyde, 88, 145, 147
 Cnut, 189, 194
 Cocboy, 132
 Coel, 118, 144
 Cogidumnos, 79, 288, 309
 Columba, St., 71, 156, 167, 168, 170, 172, 173, 181, 196,
 270-273
 Commios, 9, 10, 18, 22-25,
 30, 31, 62, 288, 308
 Conall, 179, 301
 Conbellini, 252, 288
 Concangion, 233, 288
 Concessus, 300
 Conchess, 300
 Condidan, 108
 Congus, 176
 Conmægl, 108, 137
 Constantine, 95-97, 179
 Constantius Chlorus, 166
 Coritani, 30, 106, 219, 288
 Cornavii, 30, 219, 224, 289
 Coroticus, 257
 Corstopiton, 227

- Creones, 223
 Cruithne, 151, 155, 239, 272
 Cruithni, 239, 240, 243, 244
 Cúchulainn, 301
 Culdee, 292
 Culen, 193
 Cumbria, 140, 143, 144, 147
 Cunalipi, 290, 296
 Cunchar, 193
 Cunedda, 118-125, 142, 248,
 252-256, 258
 Cuneglasos, 122, 290
 Cunobelinos, 26-28, 32-36, 38, 77, 78, 82, 290
 Cunomori, 290
 Cunovali, 290, 301
 Cuthberht, 146
 Cymbeline, 27
 Cymraes, 279
 Cynfelyn, 290
 Cynvael, 300
 Cynwal, 290, 301
- DAIRI, 264
 Dál-Cairbre, 91
 Dál-Cais, 91
 Dál-Fiatach, 157, 244, 268
 Dál-Riada, 91, 157, 244, 268
 Dalar, 272
 Dáln-Araide, 244, 268
 Daniel, 248
 Dartraighi, 297
 Dartry, 297
 Decangi, 81, 233, 288, 291
 Decantæ, 224, 230, 262, 291
 Degsastán, 158
 Deira, 114, 128, 130, 187, 291
 Déisi, 122, 245, 246, 257
 Delgovicia, 39
 Demetæ, 81, 86, 123, 217, 291
 Derventio, 39, 291
 Deva, 68, 92
 Dicalidona, 94, 166, 292, 293
 Digoll, 131
- Dinlle, 314
 Dinoot, 126, 304
 Dinorwig, 303
 Diodorus, 8, 45, 46, 53, 206
 Dion Cassius, 37, 56, 77, 92, 97
 Diviciacos, 31, 292
 Divico, 292
 Dobunni, 29, 30, 35-38, 42,
 43, 77, 254, 292
 Domnall Brecc, 158, 175
 Domnoveros, 40, 293, 296, 309
 Donald, 185
 Donald Bán, 200
 Δουηκαληδόσιος, 166, 293
 Δούσιον, 217, 295, 310
 Drumalban, 156, 159, 224
 Drust, 174-176, 179, 180
 Dub, 193
 Dubnovelaunos, 27, 293, 294, 309
 Dubthach, 74, 75
 Dumbarton, 145
 Dumnonii, 43, 44, 48, 52, 154, 160, 216, 221, 222, 232, 294
 Dumnorix, 40, 58, 65, 294
 Dunawd, 126, 127, 304
 Dúnbolg, 269, 281
 Dúnbrettan, 145
 Duncan, 189, 264
 Dungal, 176
 Dunion, 217, 295, 310
 Dunkeld, 164, 166, 180, 225, 283
 Dunocatus, 310
 Dún Nechtain, 146, 172
 Duobrivæ, 296
 Durocobrivis, 296
 Durolipons, 227, 293, 295
 Durotriges, 20, 43, 44, 52, 217, 297
 Dux Britanniarum, 104, 137,
 119, 134-136, 143, 313
 Dyfrdwy, 292, 303

- EADBERHT, 177, 182, 184
Eadgar Ætheling, 199
Eadmund, 186, 187, 199
Eadred, 187
Eadwine, 109, 128-131, 136-138, 153
Eanfrith, 132
Earn, 266
Eber, 266
Ebudæ, 223, 229, 297
Eburakon, 86
Eceni, 28, 37-39, 62, 66, 80, 84, 106, 229, 287, 288, 297
Ecgyrht, 109, 136
Ecgyfrith, 146-149, 154, 171
Ellmyn, 139
Elmet, 130
Elphin, 175
Elton, Mr., 5, 8, 45, 46
Emer, 266, 267
Emrys, 104, 298
Eochaid, 175, 184
Epaticcos, 26, 29, 297
Epeiacon, 228, 297
Epidii, 223, 229
Epidion, 223
Eppillos, 23, 24, 26, 28, 31, 33, 297
Er, 266, 267
Erc, Sons of, 179
Erinn, 66, 75, 265, 300
Erne, 265
Ersch, 150
Eumenius, 238
Evans, Mr. John, 7, 19, 23, 208

FAD FELEN, the, 63
Farinmægi, 108, 137
Féineachus, 267
Féini, 267, 280
Fergus, 175
Fichti, 240
Finan, 173

Fiacc, 75
Fidach, 155
Finlaig, 194
Finn, 236
Finnola, 193
Firbolg, 268, 280
Flavia Cæsariensis, 99
Follamhain, O', 286
Fortrenn, 95, 160, 179, 181, 193, 194, 197, 222, 312
Forum Juli, &c., 296
Four Masters, the, 64, 281

GÆL, 3
Gai's Field, 133
Galli, 2, 266, 298
Gangani, 233, 289, 298
Gartnait, 168, 172, 268
Geloni, 55, 243
Genunia, 90, 220
Geofrey, 120, 136, 143, 285
Geona Cohors, 91, 271
Geraint, 109, 235, 299
Gerontios, 96, 298
Geryon, 202
Gildas, 97, 105, 107, 122, 135, 167, 235, 244, 258, 289
Giraldus, 64
Girg, 184
Glannog, 131
Glasgow, 198
Glastonbury, 204, 265
Goddeu, 155
Gododin, 112, 118
Goidel, 3, 242, 243
Golam, 267
Granpius Mons, 89, 227
Green, Mr., 108
Griffith, 64
Grote, Mr., 65
Guened, Bret., 312
Giudi, urbs, 151
Guortepir, 122, 256
Guuricon, Caer, 314

- Gwaun, 121
 Gwledig, 104, 121, 137, 161
 Gwyddel, 242, 243
 Gwynasedd, 277, 278
 Gwyndod, 123, 311
 Gwynedd, 123, 275, 312
- HADDAN AND STUBBS, 74,
 107, 122, 241, 257
 Hadrian, 90
 Hatfield, 131
 Hathovulf, 286
 Heber, 266, 268
 Hebrides, 56, 297
 Hefenfelth, 132
 Helvetii, 58
 Hengist, 97
 Herodotus, 5, 55, 265
 Hethfeld, 131
 Hibernia, 242, 266
 Himilco, 47
 Hirend, 266
 Honorius, 96
 Hübner, Dr., 77, 88, 95, 98,
 212, 216, 247, 252, 254, 259, 311
- ICTIAN PORT, 14, 299
 Ictian Sea, 204, 299
 Ictis, 45, 299
 Ier, 266
 Indulph, 187
 Insubres, 311
 Iolo MSS., 119, 123, 124, 251, 255, 302
 Irische, 150
 Isca, 86, 295
 Isidore, 240
 Isubrigantion, 311
 Isurion, 311
 Ith, 268
 Ithel, 252
 Itius, 14, 299
 Iudeu, 133, 151, 268
- Iverna, 266, 299
 Ivernii, 266
- JAMBRES, 71
 Jannes, 71
 Jarla Saga, 190
 Jerome, St., 94
 Joceline, 143
 Johnson's Tour, 302
 Jubainville, M. d'A. de, 278
 Julius Cæsar, 8-23, 27, 28,
 205, 206, 238, 246, 308
 Julius Frontinus, 85
 Juvenal, 208, 266, 278
- KEITH INCH, 307
 Kells, 180
 Kemble's Cod. Dip., 289, 303
 Kenneth mac A., 181-183,
 192, 193, 196
 Kentigern, 144, 145, 172, 173,
 198, 248
 Keredig, 120, 123, 218, 248, 253, 257
 Kessarogion, 135
 Kilrymont, 178, 186
 Kinneil, 153, 197
 Kymro, 139, 279
 Kymry, the, 112, 116, 122, 123, 144, 279, 312
 Kynesii, 265, 276
- LATONA, 302
 Leucopibia, 230
 Liger, 203
 Liguria, 203
 Llanffinan, 173
 Lloegr, 143
 Lludd, 263
 Llyr, 281
 Lochrine, 143
 Loidis, 130, 133
 Loigaire mac Néill, 74
 Lollius Urbicus, 90

- Lossie, 232
 Loxa, 232
 Lud, 263
 Lugi, 224

MABINOGION, 73, 228, 281,
 298, 301, 309
 Mabon, 228, 301, 302
 MacCarthy, see Carthach.
 Mac-Con, 265
 Mac-Decet, 230
 Macbeth, 189, 190, 195, 196,
 198, 264, 269, 274
 Maccu Deceti, 262
 Mæatæ, 92-94, 157, 161-163, 165, 170, 223
 Maelbæaðe, see Maelbeth
 Maelbeth, 264
 Maelchon, 264
 Maelcoluim, see Malcolm
 Maelgwn, 68, 119, 122-125,
 135, 142, 246, 248, 258,
 300
 Maelpadraic, 73, 262
 Maelumi, 158, 262
 Magh-Girginn, 157
 Mag-Ithe, 268
 Magi, 69, 74
 Maglocunos, see Maelgwn
 Maid of Norway, 198
 Malcolm, 147, 186, 189, 191,
 195-200
 Manann, 154, 221
 Manaw, 112, 118, 119, 133, 142, 154, 221
 Mandubratis, 17, 18, 27, 284
 Mapbrith, W., 209
 Maponi, 228, 302
 Maponos, 228, 301
 Margaret, 199, 200
 Mandunon, 295
 Marne, 302
 Mars, 67

 Martial, 208
 Maserfelth, 132
 Matrona, 302
 Maxima Cæsariensis, 99
 Maximus, 95, 103, 144, 257
 Mawddach, 86, 218
 Mearns, the, 158, 170, 193
 Meiceren, 131
 Meilochon, 264
 Meirion, 120
 Meldi, 14
 Menapii, 22, 49
 Menevia, 152
 Mercia, 106, 109
 Mercury, 67
 Merlin, 135
 Mernis, 158
 Mervyn, 142
 Miathi, see Mæatæ
 Miati, see Mæatæ
 Miled, 267, 268
 Milesian, 267
 Milton, 143
 Minerva, 67, 68
 Mocetauc, 146
 Modron, 302
 Moerne, 158
 Mog-Corb, 264
 Mog-Nét, 263
 Mog-Nuadat, 263
 Moïpa, 90
 Mommsen, Prof., 56, 99
 Mona, 86, 130, 217
 Moneit, 263
 Moni Iudeorum, 152, 229
 Moridunion, 295
 Morini, 9, 10, 22, 49
 Morvran, 308
 Mounth, 172, 191
 Mowat, M., 59
 Mulpatrik, 262
 Mynyw, 229
 Myvyrian Arch., 128, 131
 148

- NAITON, 173
 Narbonne, 47
 Nechtan, 173-174, 178, 192, 263
 Nectarides, 105
 Neithon, 173
 Nennius, 97, 104, 116, 118, 130, 132, 133, 235, 254, 255, 268, 314
 Nero, 83
 Nét, 263, 270
 Neubauer, Dr., 299
 Niduari, 113, 221
 Nigra, Com., 73
 Ninnian, 172
 Nith, 198, 221, 270
 Nodens, 67, 263, 306
 Notitia Dignitatum, 99, 101, 228, 233, 245, 310
 Novantæ, 219-221, 231, 233
 Novios, 198, 220
 Nuada, 63, 263
 Nudd, 263
 Nynias, 149, 172

 O'CURRY, 67, 267, 279
 O'Donovan's "Four Masters," 281
 Ochil Hills, 232
 Octapitaron, 229
 Offa, 141,
 Ogam, 215, 250, 251, 263
 Oirir Gaithel, 273
 Oisín, 236
 Olympiodorus, 97
 Ond, 270
 Ondemone, 270
 Orddwy, Rhyd, 303
 Ordous, 219, 302
 Ordovices, 81, 86, 87, 121, 217, 218, 247, 248, 254, 262, 275, 302
 Orgetorix, 58, 65
 Orrea, 163

 Osric, 131
 Ostorius Scapula, 35, 80-83
 Oswald, 132, 137
 Oswine, 132
 Oswiu, 132-134, 140, 141, 145, 149, 154, 171
 Otadini, 114, 155, 221
 Οὐλλόνεος, 308
 Owen, 180

 PADARN, 218, 258
 Paraveredus, Lat., 298
 Parisi, 39, 219, 228
 Parisii, 14, 39, 41
 Paternus, 118, 218
 Patrick, St., 71, 74, 257
 Paulinus, 130
 Pausanias, 90
 Peanfahel, 153, 197
 Penbol, 269
 Pencrik, 303
 Penda, 109, 131-134, 140, 154
 Penguaul, 153
 Pengwern, 108, 141
 Penkridge, 228, 304
 Pennocrucion, 228, 232, 303
 Pentland, 152
 Petilius Cerealis, 85
 Petrianæ, 227
 Petroc, 143
 Petuaria, 39, 228, 304
 Petueriensis, 228
 Philip II., 19
 Piccardach, 239
 Pictavi, 239
 Pictavia, 185
 Pictavis, 243
 Picti, 238
 Pictones, 239, 243
 Pictores, 239
 Picts, 112, 120, 196, 238, 239, 243, 266
 Pihtes leá, 289
 Pliny, 76, 202, 203, 212

- Pomponius Mela, 41, 203
 Portus Itius, 14
 Posidonius, 8, 45, 46
 Powys, 141, 254, 275
 Præsidium, 227
 Prætorium, 227
 Prasutagos, 84, 229
 Procolitia, 227
 Procopius, 212
 Prydain, 205, 298
 Prydyn, 240, 298
 Ptolemy, 155, 163, 166, 198,
 228, 229, 232, 266, 271, 280,
 292, 296, 307, 310
 Publius Crassus, 48
 Pytchley, 289
 Pytheas, 5-8, 207

 RÆDWALD, 128
 Ravennas, 302, 310
 Reeves, Dean, 72, 74, 151, 204, 266
 Regni, 24
 Remi, 29, 304
 Rex Brittonum, 136, 142
 Rhodri, 142
 Rhun, 125, 130, 184
 Rhydderch, 144, 145
 Rhygyvarch, 255
 Rhys ab Tewdwr, 142
 Ri, 263, 264, 270
 Ridumo, 295
 Ritupiaë, 229
 Roi, 263
 Rutupiaë, 229

 SÆSON, 107
 Saint, 306
 Sais, 231
 Samson, 252
 Sanctus, 256
 Savaddon, 64
 Scipio, 5
 Scitlivissi, 252, 304

 Scotia, 196, 242
 Scott, Sir Walter, 199, 312
 Scotti, 56, 94, 239-243, 273
 Scythia, 243
 Segantii, 220, 221, 306
 Segeia, 220, 306
 Segontiaci, 17, 28, 29, 306
 Segontion, 306
 Seiont, 306
 Selgovæ, 220, 231, 232, 245,
 269, 271, 306
 Sen-Cheneoil, Tuath, 279
 Sen-Erann, Tuath, 279
 Senchus Mór, 63, 64, 267, 280
 Senemagli, 308
 Senomagli, 308
 Senotigirnos, 41, 306
 Serrigi, 246
 Setantii, 306
 Seteia, 306
 Servus Dei, 73
 Severus, 92, 93, 165
 Sidonius, 55
 Silchester, 24, 29, 283
 Silulanus, 306
 Silura, 307
 Silures, 42, 52, 64, 81, 82, 85, 217, 306
 Silvianus, 306
 Simeon of Durham, 189, 197
 Simon Magus, 70, 74
 Sirigi, 246
 Sitric, 246
 Skene, Mr., 70, 95, 108, 113,
 174, 222, 223, 266, 269, 289,
 313, 314
 Smertæ, 224
 Solinus, 42, 56, 307
 Spinis, 227
 Stilicho, 95
 Stokes, Mr., 57, 71, 75, 209, 259, 313
 Stonehenge, 250
 Strabo, 5, 7, 50, 54, 56

- Strageath, 160
 Strathbolgie, 269
 Strathclyde, 148
 Stratherne, 266
 Stuart Glennie, Mr., 236
 Suetonius, 32, 34, 79
 Suetonius Paulinus, 83, 84
 Sulpicius Severus, 307
 Sweet, Mr., 137
 Sylinancis, 307
- TACITUS, 79-86, 89, 291, 307
 Tæxali, 163, 165, 223, 232, 307
 Tæxalon, 163
 Talargan, 146, 176-180
 Tamea, 163
 Tasciovant, 26, 27, 29, 307
 Taximagulus, 308
 Teððicnius, 309
 Tegeingl, 290
 Tegid, 308
 Teilo, 229
 Tenigenonia, 309
 Tessignius, 309
 Teviotdale, 148
 Teyrnllwg, 138
 Thanet, 45, 46, 52
 Θεόδωρος, 261, 309
 Theodosius, 94, 95, 233
 Theodric, 145
 Thersites, 64
 Thorfinn, 190
 Thule, 56
 Tiberius, 34
 Tincommios, 23-25, 308
 Tiree, 268
 Togodumnos, 35, 77, 309
 Toliapis, 229
 Toutiorix, 293
 Trenacatus, 310
 Trenagusu, 308
 Treneussi, 308
- Trent, 80
 Treveri, 22
 Triads, the, 131
 Tringad, 310
 Trinovantes, 17, 18, 20, 28, 85, 294, 310
 Triphun, 256, 257
 Trisantona, 80
 Trucculensis Portus, 89, 307
 Trutulensis Portus, 89, 307
 Tuessis, 163
 Twrch Trwyth, 302
 Tyssilio, 309
 Tyssul, 309
- UNGUST, 175-180, 263
 Urien, 144, 254, 255
 Uven, 180
 Uxacona, &c., 232
 Uxama, 280
 Uxelodunon, 232, 245, 285, 310
 Uxella, 232, 310
 Uxellon, 232, 310
- VACOMAGI, 162, 164, 165, 222, 225, 232
 Valamni, 285
 Valentia, 94, 99
 Velauni, 285
 Velaunos, 285
 Vellavni, 285
 Vellocatus, 39
 Venedot, 123, 275, 311
 Veneti, 9, 47-52, 311
 Venicones, 163
 Venutios, 39
 Vepotalos, 41
 Vereda, 228, 297, 311
 Vergil, 243
 Vergobretos, 59, 312
 Verica, 23, 24
 Verlamion, 26

- | | |
|---|--------------------------|
| Vernicomes, 163, 164, 223 | WERTERMORUM, 186, 197 |
| Verteræ, 313, 314 | Werthyr, Y, 313 |
| Verturiones, 94, 160, 166,
183, 197, 222, 232, 282,
312 | Westwood, Prof., 252 |
| Vespasian, 77, 79, 85 | Whitehorne, 149 |
| Vexalla, 232 | Windisch, Prof., 67, 283 |
| Vibius Sequester, 203 | Winged Camp, 163 |
| Victoria, 160, 313 | Winwæd, 133 |
| Victorina, 282 | Woden, 287 |
| Vigfusson, Dr., 69, 190,
291 | Wordsworth, Rev. J., 300 |
| Viromandui, 284 | Wrach, Y, 68 |
| Visurix, 65 | Wredech, 178 |
| Volisios, 40 | Wrekin, the, 314 |
| Volusenus, 9, 10 | Wroxeter, 314 |
| Vortigern, 97, 135 | Wthol, 180 |
| Vortiporios, 122, 123, 256 | Wurgust, 175 |
| Vriconion, 232, 314 | ZIMMER, Prof., 71, 305 |
| | Zonaras, 93 |
| | Zosimus, 97 |

THE END.

PUBLICATIONS
OF THE
SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.

Early Britain.

A Series of Books which has for its aim the presentation of Early Britain at great historic periods.

- ANGLO-SAXON BRITAIN. By GRANT ALLEN, B.A. With Map. Fcap. 8vo., cloth boards, 2s. 6d.
CELTIC BRITAIN. By Professor RHYS. With 2 Maps. Fcap. 8vo., cloth boards, 3s.
NORMAN BRITAIN. By the Rev. W. Hunt. With Map. Fcap. 8vo., cloth boards, 2s. 6d.
ROMAN BRITAIN. By the Rev. Prebendary SCARTH. With Map. Fcap. 8vo., cloth boards, 2s. 6d.
-

Early Chroniclers of Europe.

The object of this Series is to bring readers face to face with the sources of Early European History.

Crown 8vo., cloth boards, 4s. each.

- ENGLAND. By JAMES GAIRDNER, Esq.
FRANCE. By GUSTAVE MASSON, B.A., Univ. Gallic.
ITALY. By UGO BALZANI.
-

Heroes of Science.

The aim of this Series is to show, by way of selected Biographies, the progress of the chief departments of Science.

Crown 8vo., cloth boards, 4s. each.

- ASTRONOMERS. By E. J. C. MORTON, B.A. With Diagrams.
BOTANISTS, ZOOLOGISTS, AND GEOLOGISTS, by Professor P. MARTIN DUNCAN, F.R.S.
CHEMISTS. By M. M. PATTISON MUIR, Esq., F.R.S.E. With Diagrams.

MAR 20 '68

JUN 22 '68

DEC 9 '68

Stanford University Library
Stanford, California

In order that others may use this book, please return it as soon as possible, but not later than the date due.

